Macaulay, Catherine, 1733-1791, the youngest daughter of John Sawbridge, Esq., of Ollantigh (House) in Kent, was married in 1760 to George Macaulay, M.D., and (after his death) in 1778 to Mr. Graham. She pub. a number of political pamphlets, a Treatise on Moral Truth, 1783, 8vo, Letters on Education, 1790, 4to, &c., and the following work, by which she is best known: History of England from the Accession of James II. to that of the Brunswick Line, Lon., 1763-83, 8 vols. 4to, 26. History of England from the Revolution to the Present Time, vol. i., Bath, 1778, 4to, 15s.: all that was pub. This is called the Republican History of England; and its partiality has elicited severe animadversions:

"Combining Roman admination with English faction, she vio-lated truth in her English characters, and exognerated romance in her Roman."—Disracts on the Laterary Character, ed. Lon., 1840, 387.

"When any doubt is entertained of the character of Charles, Mrs. Macaulay may be referred to; and a charge against him, if it can possibly be made out, will assuredly be found, and supported with all the references that the most animated difference can supply."—Smyth's Lects. on Mod. Hist. Lect. XVI.

Mr. Hollis, as may be supposed, had a high esteem for Mrs. Macaulay's work:

"Mrs. Macaulay's history is honostly written, and with consaderable ability and spirit, and is foll of the freest, noblest sentiments of liberty."—Hollis's Memoirs.

Horace Walpole places Mrs. Mucaulay far before Hume, and almost on a level with Robertson.

Macaulay, Rt. Hon. Thomas Babington, M.P., Baron Macaulay, of Rothley, in the county of Leicester, b. 1860, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, is a son of the late eminent philanthropist, Zachary Macaulay, who died in 1834, and a grandson of the Rev. John Mac-aulay, a Presbyterian minister in the Scottish Highlands, descended from the Macaulays of the island of Lewis, the most nothern and largest of the Outer Hebrides. The subject of our notice was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he soon distinguished hunself by his extraordinary facility in the acquisition of knowledge and the tenacity of memory which enabled him to recall it at will; in 1819, he gained the Chancellor's Medal for a poem (pub. at the time) entitled Pompeli; in 1821, he gained the same Chancellor's Modal for a poem (pub. at the time) entitled Evening; and in the same year he was, as a reward for his classical proficiency, elected to the Cravon Scholarship. In 1822, Mr. Macaulay graduseed B.A., and was elected a Fellow of Trinity; and, in 1825, he graduated M.A. On leaving college, the successful student turned his attention to law and politics, and displayed the same zeal in these new fields of research as that which had already given him a memorable name with his fellow-gownsmen. Nor was his application unrewarded with a like measure of success: called to the Bar, at Lincoln's Ina, in February, 1826, he was, about two years later, appointed by the Whig Government a Commissioner of Bankruptey; in 1830, he became a member of Parliament in the Whig interest, representing the borough of Caine, (acting also as Secretary to the Board of Control for India,) and contributed greatly by his cloquence to the triumph of the Reform Question; in December, 1832, he was returned to the first Reformed Parliament as member for leads, and re-tained his seat until 1834; in 1834, he was sent to India as a member of the Supreme Council of Calcatta, and remained abroad for two years and a balf, principally employed in the preparation of a Penal Code of Laws for India, pub. in 1838, but not yet put into execution; in 1839, he become Secretary of War; in 1840, was elected member of Parlument for the city of Edinburgh; in September, 1811, he lost these offices, in consequence of the accession of Sir Robert Peel; in 1846, on the return of the Whigs to office, he was appointed Paymaster-General of the Forces, with a seat in the Cabinet; in 1847, he was an unsuccessful candidate for Parliament, in consequence of the offence which his course on the Maynooth Grant Question had given to his Edinburgh constituents; in 1849, be was elected Lord-Rector of the University of Glasgow, and gained groat credit by his Innugural Address; in the same year he became a Bencher of Lincoln's Inu; in 1850, he was appointed to the honorary office of Professor of Ancient History in the Royal Academy; in 1853, he received the Prussian Order of Merit; in July, 1852, ho was, without any effort on his part, re-elected by the voters of Ediaburgh one of their representatives in Parliament; and, in Jan. 1856, he resigned his seat, and bade a last adieu to the troubles of political life.

"The experience of the last two years," be remarks, in his fire-well address to his constituents, "has convinced me that I cannot reasonably expect to be ever again capable of performing, eyen in an imperior manner, those duties which the public has a right to expect from every member of the House of Commons."

In September, 1857, Mr. Macaulay was raised to the secrage, and chose, as his new title, that of Baron Mucaulay, of Roibley, in the county of Leicester. Having thus given a rapid summary of Mr. Macaulay's political career, we are prepared to consider him in capacities in which he has gained at least equal distinction,—viz.: as a rout, BESAYIST, ORATOR, AND HISTORIAN.

MACAULAY AS A PORT:

We have already noticed two of the most meritorious of Mr. Macaulay's poetical compositions,—vis.: Pompeii and Evening, both of which gained the high distinction of the Chancellor's Medal,—the former in 1819, the latter

"A book which Dr. Johnson liked. . . . He had said in the morning that "Macaulay's listory of St. Kilda was very well written, except some foppary about interty and slavery." — Croker's Bossed's Life of Johnson, ed. Lous, 1548, r. 8vo, 229, 301; and see 189, 407. enriched with many other gems from youthful authors, some of whom, like Mr. Macaulay, though not to the same degree, have since attained merited celebrity in the Republic of Latters. Of these first-fruits of our author's poetical genius perhaps the most admired are The Battle of Ivry, The Cavalier's March to London, The Spanish Armada, and A Song of the Huguenots. In 1812, 8vo, Armada, and A Song of the Huguenots. In 1812, 8vo, Mr. Macaulay gave to the world his Lays of Aucteut Mr. Macaulay gave to the world his lays of Accent Rome, consisting of the spirit-stiring narrations of Ho-ratius Cocles, The Battle of the Lake Regillus, the Death of Virginia, and The Prophecy of Capys. Of this work an exquisite ed. was pub. in 1847, tp. 4to, 21s. boards; bound by Hayday, 42s.; with numerous Illustrations, original and from the antique, drawn on wood by Goo. Scharf, Jr., and engraved by Samuel Williams.

The Illustrations have been engraved, with the greatest accuracy, from designs on the wood, by Mr. Scharf, partly selected from ancient monuments and the compositions of Raphael, Giulio Romano, and Mantegna, and partly

The original designs are about thirty in number. these the most picturesque portions of the text have been select d for illustration, -Mr. Scharf's object having been to embody, to the best of his ability, the vivid pictures of the poet's imagination. The illustrations selected by Mr. Scharf from the antique, and from the Italian masters, consist of Compositions, Coms, and other Monuments, which serve to illustrate and explain the text.

There were also eds. of the Lays of Ancient Rome, pub. in 1818, 8vo; 1853, p. 8co; 1856, fp. 8vo; 1857, fp. 4to, (Schart's Illust.;) with Ivry and the Armida, 1857, 16mo.

(Schart's Hlust.;) with Ivry and the Armida, 1857, 16mo. "Mr. Macaulay's Lays of Anci of Rune' affected mittally from Mr. Leckart's Spanish translations in this—that the littler worked from the native uniterials, which he refined and improved,—the former simply from the general scope and spirit of uncent legends. Taking it for granted, according to the very probable theory of Nobular, that the semi-fluid in traditions of aff infant nations must have existed primarily in a metical torm, be retransferred some of the pertions of early Roman history back into the shape which might be supposed to have been their original one cre instraints about the pertions of early Roman history back into the shape which might be supposed to have been their original one and artistic ability. He is entirely of the Homer, the Chaucer, and Scott school, his posity being thoroughly that of action, and sentiment is seldom more than interpetionally introduced,—the atmost fidelity being thus shown to the essential characteristics of that species of composition which he has so trumplantly of that species of composition which he has so tramphantly illustrated of that species of composition which he has so trumplantly illustrated. "The four subjects selected by Mr. Macaulay are those of 'Moratus Cocles,' 'The Battle of the Lake Regillus,' 'Anguna,' and The Prophecy of Capys; and he has dethed them in a drapery of lomely grandeur, yet at the same time with a picture-spieness of effect, which carries us back to Homer in his wards of Troy and in his wanderings of Ulysses. Mr. Macaulay has evidently sedimonly, not only in the materials, instural and historical, but in the very spirit of his different legends, and he has wonderfully succeeded in this delicate, difficult, and laborious task. In vividness of outline, in graphic breadth, and in rapidity of narrative, be approaches the author of 'The Lay' and 'Marmion'—like the nighty innested, unreservedly throwing lumself into and identifying lumself with his subject. Probably the finest—at least the most postical—of the four legends is 'The Prephecy of Capys,' which breathes the very spirit of antique simplicity, and is encrusted with such a thick-falling shower of local adusions as to stamp it with the air of truth. 'The Battle of the Bridge' is, beyond the others, full of her old action and energy; and 'Virginia' is touching, from the very simplicity of its imajestic sentament,—so childlike and yet so holds.

"Mr. Macaulay is another of the few poets who have written too little by far. The fragment of 'The Armada' is like a Torso of the rules.—redokent of graphic power; and 'The Battle of Tryy,' atti ough scarcely equal to it, is also remarkable for its masculine conception and disdain of petty ornained.

"The following placid descriptive sketch from 'The Battle of the Lake Regillus' contrasts finely with the ancient spirring assoications of the security.

"The Roman character is highly poetical,—bold, brave, and independent; devoid of art or subtiety, full of faith and hope; devoted to the cause of duty as comprised in the two great points of reverence for the gods and love of country. Shakassers as wits fitness for the drama; and these 'Laya of Ancient Rome' are, in their way and degree, a further ill-stration of the truth. Mr. Macaulay might have taken—and, v trust, will yet take—wider ground; but what he has done he 1. s done nobly, and like as autique Roman. . . It is a great meet of these poems that they are free from ambition and exaggreration. Nothing seems over-duge; no tawdry piece of finery disfigures the simplicity of the pan that has been chosen. They seem to have been framed with great artistical skill, with much self-denial and abstinence from any thing incongruous, and with a very successful imitation of the effects intended to be represented. Yet every here and there images of bounty and expressions of feeling are thrown out that are whelly independent of Rome or the Romans, and that appeal to the widest sensibilities of the human heart. In point of homeliness of thought and language there is often a boldness which none but a man conscious of great powers of writing would have ventured to show. —Paor, Wilson: Black et Mag., Dec. 1842, 508, 823; and in his Essays, Crit. and Imag., Edin. and Lou., 1857, iii. 390, 418.

"He comprehends the manner of the ancient ballads as the "He comprehends the manner of the ancient ballads as theroughly as he admore their spirit. Their garmhous minuteness, their homely pathos, their close dealings with the plainest realities on the one hand, and, on the other, with the wildest imaginings of creduity, are all represented in his lays. . . . We cannot leave these Roman lays without begging for a re-issue of Mr. Macaulay's cattler French and English ballads. Wherefore, too, should be not add to the number of the latter,—so well read as he is in history, so well skilled in the art of popular song? why should be not do something more for his own country and his own countrymen?"—Low. Lord Brougham is so well pleased with the fruits gathered by Mr. Macaulay in his classical excursions that he would fain have him renew his researches:

"The learned and ingenious work of Mr Macaulay. Lays of An-tient Rome, well deserves to be consulted by the reader of the early Roman Instory. Mr. M. might render much service by under taking a Roman Instory, still a great desideration."—15th. Philos., Pt. 2,

We trust that Mr. Macaulay will remember the hint when he shall have finished the History of England on which he is at present engaged.

MACAULAY AS AN ESSAYIST:
A number of papers of unusual excellence, pub. by Mr.
Macaulay in Kuight's Quarterly Magazine, preceded the Manusher of papers of unusual excellence, pub. by Mr. Macaulay in Knight's Quanterly Magazine, preceded the celebrated essay on Milton, which introduced him to the facilities of the Edinburgh Review. This brilliant yet profound disquisition appeared in the number for August, 1825, and at once excited the interest and admiration of the public in no ordinary degree. It was sagerly devoured by readers of all shades of political opinion and all grades of mental culture,—from Sir James Mackintosh, who declared it to be worthy of the Edinburgh's best days, to the ambitious school-boy, who immediately adopted it for his next annual recitation; from the uncompromising Tory, who praised every thing but its republican logic, to the exulting Whig, who found in it for a second time the death-warrant of the first Charles. The paper on Milton was succeeded in the Review by articles from the same able pon, many of them of equal, and some of superior, merit to that famous production. The last ossay—that on the Earl of Chatham—appeared in the number for October, 1844,—nearly twenty years from the date of the first of the series. We have referred to the admiration expressed by Sir James Mackintosh of the paper on Milton: this culturent critic did not scruple, at a later day, to sulogize the author in the most flattering terms:

"The admirable writer whose language has occasioned this illustration, who at an early age has mastered overy species of composition, will doubliess hold fast to simplicity, which survives all the fishions of deviation from it, and which a man of a genius so fertile has few temptations to forsake." See Blackw. Mag., xxviii. 587.

Sir Archibald Alison, after a review of the literary characteristics of Lord Jeffrey, Sir James Mackintosh, and Sydney Smith, continues :

Never, perhaps, was a work more anxiously, more impatiently, expected by the public than Macaulay's History of England, from the first announcement of its intended preparation to the day (Dec. 17, 1855) which witnessed the publication of the third and fourth volumes. Mr. Macaqlay, however, was too conscientions a historian, and too sensible of the value of his extended literary reputation to permit himself to be hurried to the press.

Truncated Whitelockes; and second-hand authorities, were not permitted to mislead; the ease of the lounger's sofa possessed no charms, and the forbidding piles of the State-Paper Office no terrors, to one to whom criticism was a luxury and labour a necessity. For the best rewards of authorship he, therefore, has not been doomed, like many illustrious predecessors, to await the slow verdict of his own or the taily justice of a succeeding generation. The 8th ed. was pub. in 1852, 2 vols. 8vo; and, by Jan. 1856, the sale of vols. i. and ii. had reuched nearly 40,000 copies. In the United States, the sale of vols. i. and ii., in five years, (1849-54,) amounted to no less than 125,000 copies; and this number may how (1857) be considerably increased. A new ed. of vols. i.-iv., to be pub. in 7 vols. p. Svo, has been recently (1857) announced. Mr. Macaulay's volumes had hardly got fairly before the world when they were attacked with much asperity by the Rt. Hon. J. Wilson Croker, in the London Quarterly Review for March, 1849, 549-630. It is said that Mr. Croker's critical perceptions were sharpened in this case by Mr. Macaulay's strictures (Edin Rev., Sept. 1831) on his edition of Boswell's Life, of Johnson, and that he revenged on the historian the effence of the essayist; but on this subject we have no right to express an opinion. In justice to Mr. Macaulay, we could say no less than we have done on this theme; in justice to Mr. Croker, we We give some brief extracts from Mr. can say no more. Croker's critique:

"It may seem too epigrammatic—but it is, in our setious judgment, strictly true—to say that his History seems to be a kind of combination, and exaggeration of the pecularities of all his former efforts. It is is, full of political projudice and partisan advocacy as any of his parliamentary speeches, It makes the facts of English History ass fabulous as his lays do those of Roman fradition; and it is written with as captions, as degmatical, and as cynical a spirit as the bitterest of his reviews. That upon so serious an undertaking ho has lavished uncommon exertion is not to be doubted, nor can any one, during the first reading, escape the enturinement of his picture-sque, vivid, and, prograthe execution; but we have farrly stated the impression left on duracters by a more calm and leisurely perusal. . . . Mr. Biacanlay's historical marinton is poisoned with a rancoir more violent than even the passions of the time; and the literary qualities of the work, though in some respects very remarkable, are har from redeening, its substantial defects. There is hardly a page—that does not contain something objectionable either in substance or in colour; and the whole of the brilliant and at first capitivating narrative is perceived, on examination, to be impregnated to a really marvellous degree with bad taste, bad feeling, and—we are under the painful necessity of adding—bad faith. . . . Mr. Macanlay's pages, whatever may be their other characteristics, are as copious a reperfortium of vituperative cloquence as, we believe, our language can produce, and especially versume tweever thing in which he chooses (whether right for wome) other characteristics, are as copious a repertorium of vituperative eloquence as, we believe, our language can produce, and especially against every thing in which he choises (whether right or wrong) to recognise the shibbeleth of Toryism. . . We premise that we are about to enter into details, because there is, in fact, little to question or debate about but details. We have already finited that there is absolutely no new fact of any consequence, and, we think we can safely add, hardly a new view of any historical fact, in the whole book. Whatever there may remain questionable or debatable in the history of the period, we should have to argue with Burnett, Dairynple, or Mackinto-h, and not with Mr.Macaulay. . Our first complaint is of a comparatively small and almost mechanical, and yet very real, defect,—the pacity and irregularity of his dates, and the mode in which the few that he does give are overlaid, as it were, by the text. . . Our second complaint is one of the lots timportant, perhaps, but most prominent.

on any question or peint of the History of England."

But this reviewer was himself reviewed in ... Edinburgh Quarterly for July, 1849, In the concluding portion of an cologistic notice of. Mr. Macaulay's History:

"Such is this great national work,—as our countrymen have already pronounced it to be. The loud, clear voice of impartial Func has squaded her award; and it will stank, without appeal, as long as Englishmen regard their, past history and love the Constitution of which he tells. From one quarter only—and that a quarter of which we expected, and which perhaps whiled for itself, better things—has the medianchely walling of daupointed gedensy hear heard. The public naturally looked with interest for the notice of Mr. Macaulay's History is the Quirterly Review. The notice had not long appeared, wifen it was observed, with equal, wit and troth, that the writer of it, in attempting marder, had contributed suicide. We have doubted whether we should add a word in illustration of a judgment is which the public has shown, that out he word with the representatives, that it cordially agrees. ... That a johrnal of deserved name and reputation should afancance of hiese volumes propositions so openly controllerly as that on the one hand their nutter has produced no new facts and discovered no new materials, and that on the other he has made the facts of English history as fallous as his lays do those of Roman tradition, betrays, it is true, some rankling would behind. ... It was as great mistake to assaid this work on the score of accuracy. Its author was the last man likely to be caught tripping on that head."—Edin. Rev., x. 281–282, 200.

"It is this partial and one-sided exposition of the truth, accompanied by a general exaggerated style of composition, more than positive innecuracy, that we complain of in Mr. Macaulay. It is this statement of the facts on both sides which, amidst all our admiration of his genius, we often desiderate in his entrancing pages; and nothing but the adoption of it, and taking his seat on the Birch instead of the Bars of thetary, is required to render his noble work as weighty as it a shle, and as influential in forming the opinion of future ages as it unquestionably will be successful in interesting the present."—Black seeds May. Particular portions of Mr. Macaulay's History have been criticized by different critics: Wm. Hepwarth Dixon and Samuel M. Janney (see pp. 506 and 954 of this Dictionary) have defended the character of William Penn; Hugh Miller and others have espoused the cause of the Scotch; Dr. Lingard (see Lon. Quar. Rev., lxxxix. 289, n.) that of the Roman Catholic Church; and Churchill Babington (see Edin. Rev., xc. 287, n.) opntends for a higher status for the clergy of the seventeenth contury then Mr. Macaulay will allow them. Other cri-ticisms upon various points discussed in the history have appeared in the columns of the Athenseum, the Times,

From the date of the publication of the first and second volumes of Mr. Macaulay's History, the public were anxiously awaiting, month after month, year after year, the appearance of the continuation of this fascinating production; but the tedious term of Jacob's servitude elapsed before the eager expectants were gratified. Dec. 17, 1855, will long be remembered in the annals of Paternostor Row. The publishers had promised the third and fourth volumes of the History on that day; and, as the rource volumes of the first and second volumes had consisted of 5000 copies only, it was presumed that 25,000 would be amply sufficient to meet the public demand. But this mormous pile of books—weighing no less than fifty-six this—was exhausted the first day, and eleven thousand disappointed applicants remained unsatisfied, to envy the happy possessors and to insist upon a new impression being immediately put to press. The delighted publishers apologized for the disappointment, and asked for another month's time to fill the unsupplied orders. But this demonth's time to fill the unsupplied orders. But this de-mand, extraordinary as it was, was groatly surpassed in America. One publishing-house in New York sold 73,000 vols. In ten days, (three different styles and prices,) and 25,000 more were immediately issued in Philadelphin. 10,000 copies were stereotyped, printed, and in the hands of the publishers, within fifty working-hours, (more than one hundred compositors being employed on the epter-prise;) and editions were pub. in Boston, and probably in other cities of the United States. We presume that the aggregate sale in England and America within the first four works from the date of publication regularable. the aggregate said in England and America within the first four weeks from the date of publication considerably exceeded, 150,000 copies. 'On the continent of Europe, editions of the History were pub. in Dutch, (Issued by M. C. S. Ery, at the Hague, 4th Part pub. Sept. 1856,) and in Hungarian, trans. by M. Auton Szongery. As regards the division of time in the four volumes of the History, vol. i. closes with an account of the occurrences of the autumn of 1685; in the concluding chapter of vol. ii. we find William and Mary seated on the English throne; vol. fil. comprises the history of events in 1689, '90, and '91; and vol. iv. terminates with the Pence of Ryswick in 1697. It is stated that for vols, i. and ii. Messts. Longman agreed to allow the author £600 per annum for the privilege of publication for ten years, the copyright remaining the property of Mr. Macaulay, and that the copyright of vols. iii. and iv. was purchased by the same house for £16,000. We do not vouch for the correctness of these figures, but presume that they represent the truth.

Whether Mr. Macaulay will be able to carry his history down to so recent a point as he originally designed—"the memory of men yet living"—is now a matter of some doubt in the public mind; but it is to be remembered that by far the greater part of the historian's task is now accomplished: the history of England from the Peace of Ryswick to the close of the American War presents but few points which require extended examination and minute investigation. We trust that Mr. Macaulay and minute investigation. We trust that Mr. Macaulay will live to carry his narration down to 1789, the starting-point of Sir Archibald Alison's History. We shall then have an uninterrupted narrative, in the histories of Hume, Macaulay, and Alison, extending over a period of 1907 years, viz.: 3.0. 55-A.D. 1852.

We must not conclude without some brief citations of opinions on the merits of volumes iii. and iv. of Mr.
Madaulay's History. A lively interest was felt before the appearance of these volumes to see in what manner the historian would treat the great avents which brought about the Revolution of 1688, and the measures of almost equal importance which immediately followed the settlement which secured the English throne to William and Mary and their Protestant successors. Whatever may be thought of the political savinus of the author, thuse can be but one quesden as regards his admirable facility in condensation, his power of graphic portraiture, and the lofty eloquence of his chetorio. We have heard Mr. Bandroff, the American historian, himself long skilled in sight-paper, research, express his autonichment at the marvellous manner in which Mr. Macculay has condensed volumes of matter in the comparatively few passages of But to our which his last two volumes are composed.

volumes of matter in the comparatively lew passages of which his last two volumes are composed. But to our quotations:

"We conclude, as we commenced, in unfeigned admiration of the power, wisdom, and success of this great national work; of the comprehensive philosophy of its plaz, and the rare felicity of its comprehensive philosophy of its plaz, and the rare felicity of its execution. The height at which it aims is ambitious; but Mr. Macaulay has reached it, and will hand down his name to future times indissolubly linked with that free constitution the history of which he has done so much to illustrate. Let those who wish to study the genius of British liberty learn by the light of these volumes, inhibit their spirit, and be roused by their noble fervour to thoughts and deeds worthy of freemen. As long as she is animated by such patriotism and imbued with such principles we may angur the best for the future of our country, and for the dynasty established by.William, under which she has risen to such freedom and such greatness."—bill. Ret. Alan. 1837.

"Mr. Macaulay's peculiar qualifications for the great task he has undertaken are well known. Probably no man of our days endoys so wonderful a memory, or possesses such extenders and varied knowledge. In science we do not suppose he is much of a prefetent, but over the field of Hecature his reign is universal. History, especially that of England, has always been his favourite study, and he has devoted to the volumes already published many years of indefatjable toil. Every page hears testimony to a degree of conscientions and minute research which no historian has over surpassed, and which only Grote, Gibbon, and Hallum, in this country, have ever approached."—North British Rec., May, 1850.

"With the rest of the world we come with our homage to Mr. Macaulay. Steady, strong, and naiform the stream of his thought continues to flow; and, without effort, or with no outward sign of the keeps his place as the first living writer of English prose. There is no occasion

We quote another comment:

"The Principle upon which Mr. Macaday wrote his IKstory.

"Mr. Cuarx:—In reading Macaday's Essays the other day, I came across a passage in which the author lays down the principles on which, in his opinion, history ought to be written. It may, perhaps, have some interest for your readers, as being, in some sort, a detence to the charges which many reviewers have not scrupled to bring against the historian of James and William, of giving a false colouring to events. Speaking of Machiavelli's History, he says,—

"The history does not appear to be the fruit of much industry or research. It is unquestgoughty inaccurate. But it is elegent, lively, and picturesque, beyond any other in the Italian language. The reader, we believe, carries away from it a more vivid and a more feithful impression of the national character and manners than from more correct accounts. The truth is, that the book

The reader, we believe, carries away from it a more vivia and a more fitted impression of the national character and manuers than from more correct accounts. The truth is, that the book belongs rather to ancient than to modern literature. It is fin the style not of Davila and Clarendon, but of Horodotis and Tacitus. The classical histories may almost be called romances founded in fact. The relation is, no doubt, in all its principal points, strictly true. But the numerous little incidents which heighten the interest, the words, the gestures, the looks, are evidently furnished by the imagination of the author. The fashion of later times is different. A more exact nerrative is given by the writer. It may be doubted whether more exact nerious may be conveyed to the reader. The best portraits are perhaps those in which there is a sinkin mixing of carcature; and wesare not certain that the best histories are not those in which a little of the exaggeration of fine intions narrative is judiciously employed. Something is lost is accuracy, but much is gained in effect. The fainter lines are neglected, but the great characteristic features are imprinted on the mind forever,—Essay on Machiavells, March, 1827, Essays vol. 1, p. 110. vol. i. p. 110.

We should not omit to mention that Mr. Macaulay has lately contributed to the 8th ed. of the Encyclopedia Britannica, now (1857) passing through the press, Lives of Dr. Samuel Johnson, of Oliver Goldsmith, of Bishop Atterbury, and of John Bunyan. These have York, also pub., in 1857, Biographical and Historical. Sketches by T. B. Macnulay, consisting of the four biographical articles just noticed, and eighty-three selections from the History of England.

With a memory so retentive, stores of information so multifarious, and a vocabulary more coprous than is generally given to the sons of men, it may well be supposed that the essayist, orator, poet, and historian possesses substantial claims to distinction as a brilliant, instructive, and interesting conversationist. Such, indeed, is the fact. Tom Moore again and again expresses his astonishment at Macaulay's wonderful powers, e.g.:

"Dised at Lansdowne House. . . Sat between Macaulay and Regers. Of Macaulay's range of knowledge shy thing may be believed, so wonderful is his memory. "—Diary, Aug. 2d, 1840: Memours, de., vil. 280.

Vent to Bowood to dinner. . . . Macaulay wonderful: never.

"Went to Bowood to dinner.... Macaulay wonderful: never, perhaps, was there combined so much falent with so marvellous a memory. To attempt to record his conversation, one must be as wonderfully gifted with memory as himself."—Diary, Oct. 21st, 1846: Memoris, de., vil. 283.

"Macaulay, another of the guests, and I stayed for some time. Ho is a most wonderful man.—Diary, Dec. 15th and 16th: Memoris, de., vil. 304. (Queted previously in another connexion.).
"Breakfasted this morning with Milnes, to meet the American Minister, Hallam. Macaulay, &c. &c. Macaulay opened for us quite a new character of his marvellous memory, which astonished us as much as it anneed me; and that was his acquaintance with the old lirish shang ballads, such as "The Night before Larry was Stretched." &c. &c., many of which he repeated as glibly as I could my boyhood. He certainly obeys most wonderfully Eloisa's injunction, 'Do all things but forget."—Diary, March 18th, 1842 r Memoirs, dc., vil. 314-315.

But perhaps no one of these interviews delighted Moore

But perhaps no one of these interviews delighted Moore so greatly as the one next to be noticed, the account of which will remind the reader of the literary dinner at Foote's, when Dr. Johnson electrified the eulogizing translator of Demosthenes with the blunt declaration, "That speech I wrote in a garret in Exeter Street." But

"Went (Lord John and I together, in a hackney-soach) to breakfast with Rogers. The party, besides ourselves, Macanlay, Luttrell, and Campbell. Macanlay gays us an account of the Mondheitic controvers, as revived at present among some of the fanatics of the day. In the course of conversation Campbell quoted a line, 're dimersont, from whom we gunt our spoons,' and, locking over at me, said, significantly, 'low ought to know that line.' I pleaded not gnilty. Upon which he said, 'It is a poem that appeared in The Times, which every one attributes to you,' but I again declared that I did not even remember it. Macanlay then broke schence, and said, to our general surprise,' That is mine.' On which we all expressed a wish to have it recalled to our memories, and he repeated the whole of it. I then remembered having been much struck with it at the time, and said that there was another squib, still better, on the subject of William Bankes's candidateship for Cambridge, which so amused me when it appeared, and showed such power in that style of composition, that I wrote up to Exmes about it, and advised him by all means to seeme that hand as an ally. 'That was mine also,' said Macanlay; thus discovering to use a new power. In addition to that varied store of talent which we had already known him to possess. He is certainly one of the most remarkable men of the day."—Jane 26, 1831: Memoirs, de., vi. 213-214.

We have ourselves listened with great interest to Mr.

We have ourselves listened with great interest to Mr. Washington Irving's graphic description of the historical arguments (not "wit-combats") between Hallam and Macaulay. Mr. Irving assured us that Macaulay could quote with as much facility from the volume and page of the authorities which he referred to as if they were immediately under his eye.

Among the many honours conferred upon our author, not the least was his election, together with Mr. Prescott, November 30, 1852, to membership of the Royal Irish Academy. These gentlemen were elected to fill the vacancies in the department of polite scholarship (which numbers only fifteen) caused by the death of Moore and

"Macaulety," observed the secretary on that occasion, "the histogram, the critic, the poet, the philosopher,—however individuals may find fault with his history, dissent from his criticism, censure his poems, or dispute his philosophy,—must still be regarded as one of the foremost literary men in the world."

The last Sudney Smith also bears tehtimony to Macause.

The late Sydney Smith also bears teltimony to Meaulay's wide range of knowledge and conversational fluency, and—far higher commendation—to his patrictism and tolitical honesty:
"I always prophesied his greatness, from the first moment I saw him, then a very young and unknown man on the Northern circuit. There are no limits to his knowledge, on small subjects as well as great; he is like a book in breeches.

"Yes; I agree, he is certainly more agreeable since his return from India. Illa enemies might have said before (though I never did so) that he talked rathes doo much; but now he has occasional fashes of silence that make his conversation perfectly delightful. But what is far better and more important than all this is, that I believe Macaulay to be incorruptible. You might by ribbons, stars, garters, wealth, title, before him in vain. He has an honest, genuine lave of his country; and the world could not bribe him to neglect her interests."

"One work, however, the author does strongly recommend, from long personal, experience of its utility.—Vir. MacCuiloch's Dictionary of Commerce and Commercial Navagation. It contains an immense quantity of authentic and well-digorated information on all subjects of domestic and foreign trade and commerce. on banking, joint-stock companies, exports and imports, book-keeping and accounts, &c. &c. It is, in fact, a wine of practical knowledge for the practical lawyer. . . . "The most ample and satisfactory Commercial Directory is Br. The articles are condensed, and abound in such a variety of usoful information that no commercial lawyer can dispense with its sid."—Marcin's Leg. Bibl. Phila., 1847, 480.

"Without exaggeration, one of the most wonderful compilations of the age. The power of continuous labour, the wide inquiry, and the artistical finish, which have been brought into play by this work, are probably unrivalled in the history of literature.

Mr. MacCuiloch occupies a high place amonget the authors of the day as a hard-headed, original thinker in political economy; a still higher, as one of the most zealous and mecossals labourers in rendering that weienca popular; but, of all his publications, his Commercial Ectionary is, the one least likely to encounter the rivary of a work of superior or even equal value."—Lon. "The Protestant. a series of periodical papers composed by Mr. McGavin of Glaegow. contains the fullest delineation of the Poplsh system, and the most powerful confutation of its principles, in a popular style, that we have seen. "I have much pleasure in calling attention to a collection of periodical papers entitled 'The Protestant.' Both its documentary evidence, and its original argumentation against the Church of Rome, appear to me strong and conclusive in establishing the antiscriptural and anti-social doctrines of that destructive system, which is not more opposed to true religion than it is to civil liberty."—Hugat MacNeurs, of Liverpool.

"A work of no ordinary merit." Lounder's Brit. Lib., 1000.

"It is worthy of an extensive circulation, and we have no doubt is destined to great usefulness. It is a favourable circumstance attending it, that it is not only distinguished throughout by sound and perspictous reasoning and in many instances by eloquence of a high order, but also that it is pervaded by the amilable, pure, and generous spirit which Christianity inspires. May the benevolent wish of its author be accomplished, in its becoming instrumental in confirming the fulth and elevating the views especially of our young men, in whose intellectual and moral character may be bound up the destinies of our country through successive ages."—WILLIAM B. SPRAGUE, D.D.: N. Amer. Rev., XXXVI, 345-358, April, 1833.

Writing at the distance of about a quarter of a century from the date of the article just quoted, we are happy to attest that the "benevolent wishes" of the author and his accest that the "concroner winnes of the author and his feviewer have been most abundantly gratified. We ourselves have heard, within the last few years, from the author of these Lectures, a grateful acknowledgment of many instances in which individuals had tendered their many instances in which instrument of their happy escape thanks to him as the instrument of their happy escape from the sophistries and absurdities of infidelity. tians should consider it their solemn duty to give such works a wide circulation, especially among the skeptical of their own acquaintance. But this is a subject already noticed in our life of Donnapan, Philip, p. 510 of this Dictionary. "He is distinguished for the soundness and clearness of his evangelical views, and for the expository character of his preaching. That for which as a preacher he is most eminent is his power of illustrating Scripture by Scripture. And his mode of doing this shows at once the fullness and the accuracy of his knowledge of Scripture, and the transparent simplicity of his conception. . . . In all his preaching he aims to lay broad and deep the foundations of Christian character. In strong, clear views of man's sinfulness and need, and Christ's fullness and freeness as a Saviour." — Fash: Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N. the article of October 2 awards to Dr. Mackay the high praise that "In his songs, as in all his writings, he has one great purpose at heart, from which he never deviates for a moment,—the promotion of human writue and human happliess. Free government, equal laws, liberal institutions, an enhightened spirit in the ruling powers, the diffusion among all classes of the best feelings and charities of social and domestic life,—there are the objects which he pursues in overy line of his writings. In this respect it may be said that he stands alone: at least, we know of no other of whom the same thing can be said to an equal extent. . . . His verse is exceedingly sweet, flowing, and metallous: and his skill in that musical art has given him a command over the resources of rhythm which few English song writers possess. In his happiest offusions he has combined the force of Burns with the elegance and polish of Moare."

"If any gentle-hearted, imaginative person would have the springs of childhood's purest feelings touched, and the aspirations of manhood's noblest moods strengthened, let him read the aweet peans of Charles Mackay. If any strong-souled reference, buttling with evil times and sellish men, would feed the fountsins of his faith and charry and brighten the visions of his choicest hours, let him read the glemous poems of Charles Mackay. His writings are not the poerty of tragely, of metaphysics, or of tradition; but of happiness, of beauty and hope, of nature and truth, of man and reform. It is pre-eminently the poorty of the times, singing—in native music, whose thrilling appeals stir the blood like a trumpel's blasts, and whose tender suggestiveness melts the eyes like an scalau's mehucholy—the best characteristics, the wiset lessons, and the chief duties of the present age."—Christian Krumner, (Roston): Vide No. 15 supra.

Althe head and the heart of this author (although he is too modest to make high claims for either) in truth require no gratuitous commendation. His muse has indeed the truth, and depth, and insight of poetry, lacking only the passionsteness, ire, and repure with which its constitues grandour, oftener giddiness, intoxicates the tancy. Mr. Hallam does not think so well of the Essays:

"The Essays of Sir George Mackenzie are empty and diffuso: the style is full of pedantic words to a degree of barbarism; and, though they were chiefly written after the Revolution, he seems to have wholly formed himself on the older writers, such as Sir Thomas Browne, or even Feitham. He affects this obsoleto and unpleasing termination of the third person in the verb in cla, which was going out of use even in the pulpit, besides other rust of archaism. Nothing can be more unlike the manner of Dryden, Locks, or Temple. In his matter he seems a usere declaimer,—as if the world would any longer endure the trivial morality which the sixteenth century had borrowed from Seneca or the dull chics of sermons. It is probable that, as Mackenzie was a man who had seen and read much, he must have some better passages than I have found in glancing shortly at his works."—Let. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. Mackennie, Henry, 1745-1831, a native of Edinburgh, the son of Joshua Mackennie, M.D., was educated at the University of Edinburgh; subsequently became an attorney of the Scottish Court of Exchequer, and studied English Exchequer practice in London; in 1804, was rewarded for his political tructs in defence of the tories by the office of Comptroller of Taxes for Scotland, and retained this lucrative post until his death. His house was for many years the principal resort of the distinguished literary and political characters of Edinburgh and of all visitors who could secure a proper introduction.

"Henry Mackenzic's excellent conversation, agreeable family, good evening parties, and the interest attached to united age and reputation, made his house one of the pleasantests: One of the Arbitri Elegantiarum of Old Edinburgh, he survived to floutish in a new sens."—Lord Cockburn's Memorials of his Time, (hap. v., 1866, q. v.

His literary productions are as follows: 1. The Man of Feeling; a Novel, 1771, 8vo. Pub. anonymously, and not claimed by the author until appropriated by Eccles, of Bath, who produced a copy of the whole written in his own hand, with blottings, interlineations, and corrections. The style of The Man of Feeling has been thought to resemble that of Tristram Shandy; but Sir Walter Scott thinks the points of difference quite as many and as striking as the resemblances. He concludes many and as striking as the resemblances. He concludes his comparison with the remark,—

"Yet, while marking this broad and distinct difference between these two authors, the most celebrated certainly among those who are termed sentimental, it is but fair to Sterne to add that, although Mackenzie has rejected his license of wat and flights of imagination, retrenched in a great measure his episodical digressiens, and altogether banished the indecency and buffornery to which he had too frequent recourse, still, their volumes must be accounted as belonging to the same class; and, amongst the thousand imitators who have pursued their path, we cannot recollect one English author who is entitled to the same honour... In future compositions, the author dropped even that resemblance which the style of The Man of Feling bears in some particulars to the works of Sterne; and this country may boast that, in one instance at least, she has produced, in Mackenzie, a writer of pure, unusical, Addisonian presse, which retains the quality of vigour without forfeiting that of cleverness and simplicity."—Life of Mackenzie: Sodt's Miscill. Prose Works, Abbotsford ed, 1850, 345, 346.

"His Man of Feeling is the offspring of the Sontimental Journey and Werter schools: it is better regulated than the first, and less frantic than the second: the hero is possessed with a passion which he has too much modesty to utter, and dies, of true love and

"The tender pleasures which The Man of Feeling excites is wholly without alloy. Its here is the most beautiful personification of gentleness, patience, and meek sufferings which the heart can conceive."—Str. T. N. Talfourn: Lon. New Month, Mag., and in his Urit. and Miscell. Writings.
"The tile of "The Man of Feeling' adhered to him ever after the publication of that novel; and it was a good example of the difference there sometimes is between a man and his work. Straugers used to fancy that he must be a pensive, sentimental Harley; whereas he was far better,—a hard-headed, practical man, as full of worldly wisdom as most of his fictitious characters are devoid of it, and this without in the least impairing the affections are softness of his heart."—Load Cockburn: Memorials of his Time, 1856.

"It seems to be intended as a second part to The Man of Fleting. It breathes the same tone of exquisite moral delicacy and of refined sentimentality."—Sir Walter Scott: Life of Muckenzie.

"The Man of the World' proved that Mackensie's genius had not strength for three volumes, but belonged to short romances and brief tales, where one action suffices, and one train of sentiment is sufficient."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. &c.

"The attempt to obtain intricacy of plot disturbs the emotion which in the other works of the author is so harmoniously excited. A tale of sentiment should be most simple. Its whole effect of A tale of sentiment should be most simple. Its whole effect of this story is the length of time over which it spreads its narrative. . . . Still, there are in this tale scenes of pathos delicious as any which even the author himself has drawn."

The very acute feelings which the work usually excites among the readers whose sympathies are liable to be awakened by scenes of firtifious distress we are disposed to ascribe to the extreme accuracy and truth of the sentiments, so well as the beautiful manner in which they are expressed. Ills essays have been highly commended by eminent authorities.

"The Northern Addison, who revived the art of periodical writing, and sketched, though with a light penol, the follies and the lesser vices of his time, has showed himself a master of playful satire. The historian of the Homespun Family may place his narrative, without fear of shame, by the side of The Vicar of Wikkfield. "The principal object of Mackenzie, in all his novels, has been to irredent and sustain a tone of moral pathos, by representing the effect of incidents, whether important or trilling, upon the human mind, and especially on those which are not only just, honourable, and intelligent, but so framed as to be responsive to those finer fielings by which ordinary hearts are callous."—Size Walter Scorr; Life of Mackenzie.

"The beautiful visions of his pathetic imagination," says Wilson on another occasion, "had stamped a soft and delicions, but deep and indelible, impression on my mind long before I had heard the same of criticism. The vary names of the heroes and heroines of his delightful stories sounded in my ears like the ochoes of some old romants melody, too simple and too beautiful to have been thamed in these degenerate, over-scientific days."

"The polished elegance and gracuful pathes of Henry Mackanzie made his name widely known: he is a master in the neat, the pretty, and the beautiful: he knows how to prepare and arrange his materials so as to waste nothing; he sets all in a proper light as he has just enough, and no more, to complete his undertaking, he cannot afford to be prodigal of his treasure, and is compolled to exhibit his sentiments and his incidents like stowers at a show. He has, perhaps, written some of the most touching little stories in the language."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Bing, and Crit. Hist., &c.

"Mackenzie is a sort of link between Sterne and Scott. He belongs to a very mail week off-shoot of English literature,—the sentimental style, which Cumberland made nauseous, and which is not in the national taste. Sterne's mixture of coarseness is undured from his infinite humour, but his unclean dress of lineay-woolesy trimmed with blonde lace—the sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibility stuff with the thorough indecencies—has happily died out; and Mr. Mackenzie's sensibility stuff with the thorough of a Man of the World: Lon. "We rejuice to know and feel that these delicious tales cannot perish. Since they were written, indeed, the national imagination has been in a great degree perverted by strong excitements, and 'fed on poisons till they have become a kind of nutriment. But the quiet and unpresuning beauties of these works depend not on the fashion of the world. They cannot be out of date till the dramms of young imagination shall vanish, and the deepest sympathies of love and hope be stilled forever. While other works are extulied, of young imagination shall vanish, and the deepest sympathies of love and hope be stilled forever. While other works are extelled, admired, and reviewed, these will be loved and wept over. Their author, in the evening of his days, may truly feel that he has not lived in vain. Gentle hearts shall ever blend their thoughts of him among their remembrances of the benefactors of their youth. And when the fever of the world 'shall hang upon the beatings of their hearts,' how often will their spirits turn to him who, as he cast a soft seriousness over the morning of life, shall assist in tranquillizing its noontide sorrows! Mackenzie, R. Shelton, M.D., D.C.L., b. 1809, in Limerick, Ireland, is second son of Captain Kenneth Mackenzie, author of a volume of Gaelic poetry, Glasgow, 1796, (ante.) The subject of our notice studied medicine in Cork, and graduated in Dublin, but has not practised. Has devoted himself to literature from his eighteenth year, when he undertook the editorship of a newspaper in England, in which capacity he continued, in various localities, until 1845, when he became London Secretary of a railway-company, which latter position he resigned in 1851. In the interval he contributed largely to leading periodicals and annuals in England and America; and, writing a weekly news-letter to the New York Evening Star, from 1834 to he we-letter to the New York Evening Star, from 1834 to the decesse of that paper, was the first regular salaried European correspondent of the American press. Was made LL.D. of Glasgow University in 1834, and D.C.L. of Oxford in 1844. Published Lays of Palestine in 1828, 12mo; wrote a considerable portion of The Georgian Era, 1832-34; Titian, a Venetian Art-Novel, in 1843, 3 vols. p. 8vo; a Life of Guizot, (profixed to a translation of Democracy and its Mission,) in 1846; Partnership "en Commandite," a legal commercial work, in 1847, 8vo; Mornings at Matlock, a Collection of Stories, 1850, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Came to New York in 1852, where he has continued, connected with the newspaper press, and has sined, connected with the newspaper press, and has edited, with very copious notes and original biographics of the authors, Sheil's Sketches of the Irish Bar, 1854, 2 vols. 12mo; The Noetes Ambrosiane of Blackwood's Magazine, 1854, 5 vols. 12mo; De Quincey's Klostorheim, 1855, 16mo; Life of Curran, 1855, 12mo; Lady Morgan's O'Brions and O'Flaherties, 1857, 2 vols. 12mo; De Marin's Miscallancous Works 1855, 57 8 vols. 12mo; Dr. Maginn's Miscellaneous Works, 1855-57, 5 vols, 12mo. His original works in America have been Bits of Blarney, 1855, 12mo; Tressillan, or The Story-Tellers, 1857, 12mo. He is now engaged in the preparation of three new works,—viz.: Poetry and Poets of Ireland, Men of Ninety-Right, Actors and Actresses,—and contemplates new edi-tions of several others. Since the above was written, Dr. Mackenzie has removed (Aug. 1857) to Philadelphia, and assumed the duties connected with the foreign and literary editorship of The Press, a new daily paper of that city.

"The pervading personality, lively spirit, and great accuracy of Dr. Mackenzie's notes as a book-editor constitute their value. His life has been peased in intimacy and correspondence with the leading literati and politicians of his time, and he has a remarkable memory for dates, events, and persons, which overflows into expression when he puts pen to peaper. Such also is his conversation,—crowded with ane-dottes of notable and noticeable persons and things; and no one would deem from his lively conversation, that he had nearly exhausted libraries as a reader and contributed to fall them as a writer."

The reader will find many of Dr. Mackenzie's interesting reminiscences of his distinguished literary contemporates in his edit. of Noctes Ambrosianm, (see Index.)

I. MACKINTOSH THE POLITICAL PHILOSOPHER

In our life of Edmund Burko (see pp. 290-291 of this Dictionary) we have referred to the enthusiastic reception accorded by the opponents of the French revolu-tionary doctrines to the celebrated "Reflections" on the political storm which had already swept the throne and political storis which has already supported the destruction of civilized society throughout Europe. The publication of civilized society throughout Europe. the Reflections immediately elicited legions of so-called answers and refutations; but, with the exception of Paine's Rights of Man, no one of times numerous re-joinders seems to have counteracted to any perceptible degree the overwhelming influence on the public mind of the irresistible logic and fervid eloquence of the close reasoner, as well as the most impassioned pleader, of the age. It was at this opportune moment—opportune for a writer who sought to attract the eye of the public—that Mackintosh gave to the world his Vindiciae Gallicae; or, A Defence of the French Revolution and its English Admirers against the Accusations of the Right Hon. Ed-Admirers against the accusations of the Right From January Burke, including some Strictures on the late production of Mons. De Calonne, April, 1791. The Friends of the People (the Society of this name, indeed, was not instituted until the following year) were not ignorant of the important aid shortly to be expected from their valuations. able ally; and Paine, now engaged in the preparation of The Rights of Man, remarked to an acquaintance of Mackintosh:

"Tell your friend that he will come too late unless he hastens, for after the appearance of my reply nothing more will remain to be said."

Paine certainly was no contemptible antagonist; but, had his talents been far greater, his political principles irrefutable, and his private morals immaculate, he would irrefutable, and his private morals immaculate, he would still have lacked elements of strength the possession of which gave Mackintosh a very decided advantage:

"Those who remember," says the author of the Piesaures of Hope, "the impression that was made by Burke's writings on the then living generation, will recollect that, in the better-educated classis of society, there was a general pronesses to go with Burke; and it is my sincere opinion that that pronesses would have become universal, if such a mind as Mackintosh's had nos, general itself, like a breakwater, to the general springidic of Burke ism. I may be reminded that there was such a man as Thomas Patos, and that he strongly answered, at the or of public opinion, ill the arguments of Burke. I do not deny this fact; and Embould be serry if I could be blind, even with tears for Mackintosh in my sysa, to the services that have been rendered to the cause of truth by the shrewdises and the courage of Thomas Paine. But without disparagrament to Paina, in a great and essential view, it must be admitted that, through radically secund in sense, he was deficient in the strategeties of philosophy, whilst Markintosh met Burke perfectly the equal in the tractics of moral science and beauty of sivic and illustration. Hence Mackintosh weat, as the aposite of liberalism, among a class—perhape too influential in society—to whom the manner of Paine was repulsive. Paine had something of a course battred towards Burks. Mackintosh abhorred Burks's principles, but he had a chivalrous admiration of his gentus. He could foil him, moraover, at his own weapons. He was logicant enough trajetert the sophist by the rules of legic; and he tuned against Burks not only popular opinion, but classical and tasteni feelings."—Life of Mackintosh, vol. i. chap. ii.

That the Vindiciae Gallices succeeded in immediately gaining the public eye and ear—we are not so certain of gaining the public eye and ear-we are not so certain of the heart-is abundantly proved by the rapid sale of three aditions, all pub. in the same year. Of course, it at once attracted the interested attention of the great political leaders of the day: Fox greeted it with dignified satisfaction; Parr eulogized it with turgid Johnsonian bombast; and the "mixed multitude" of Red Republicans who followed the army of political reformers forgave the philosophy which they could not understand for the sake bast; and the "mixed multitude" of Red Republicans who followed the army of political reformers for gave the philosophy which they could not understand for the sake of the spoils which they trusted soon to divide.

"An honourable gentleman," says Mi. Fox in the House of Commons, "has quoted a most able book on the subject of the French Revolution, the work of Mr. Mackintosh; and I rejoice to see that gentlemen begin to acknowledge the merits of that omment writer, and that the impression that it made upon me at the time is now felt and acknowledge down by those who disputed its suthenty. . . . It now appears that I did not greatly overrate this performance, and that those persons now quote Mr Mackintosh as an authority who before treated him with spleneric scorn."

"In Mackintosh I see the stemmers of a republican without his scimony, and the ardour of a reto mer without his unpetuosity. His taste in morals, like that of Mr Burke's, is equally pure and delicate with his taste in literature. His mind is so comprehensive that generalities cease to be barren, and so vigorous that detruitisef becomes interesting. He introduces every question with perspicuity, states it with precision, and pursues it with easy, unsafected method. Sometimes, perhaps, he may amuse his readers with excursions into paradox, but he neve hewliders them by flights into romance. His philosophy is fax more just and smilable than the philosophy of Paine; and his eloquence is only not equal to the eloquence of Burke. He is a symmentative without sophistry, and sublime without extravagence?"—Dr. P. err.

"At the time when the Vindices Gallices first made its appearance, as a reply to the Reflections on the Seach Revolution, it was cried up by the partisans of the new school as a work superior in the charms of composition to its redoubted rival. In acuteness, depth, and soundness of reasoning of course, there is a supposed to be no comparison. . . His Vindices Gallices first fine it fell into my hands in the announcement of its opinions. Mr. Canning admitted to Mr. Sharp that he had read the Vindicias Gallices, "on its first coming out, with as much admiration as he had ever felt."

"Read Maghirtosh's Vindicia Gallices His style and muner, in this piece, are magnificent, but uniformly cumbrous, and occasionally warm. He has infinitely improved both in his Preliminary Discourse, though some of the ponderosity still remains. There can hardly be a more express and full contradiction than in two passages, —p. 260 of the Vindicias and p. 49 of the Discourse."—Gren's Darry of a Lover of Lat, April the 20th, 1799, Ipawich, 1810, 4th, 1390-131.

"The literary merit of this work was very considerable in itself; and its reputation was, from some auxiliary circumstances, still greater. The splendid art of Barke's gailus illuminated the opposition of the satellite:

'Late tulit prutjum jam nunc certaminis hujus, Quo cum victus crit, mecam certasse feretur.'

Quo cam viotus crit, mecan certises feretur."

"The very contest was a distinction in the eye of the world, while the Jacobin adversaries of Burke extelled and gazgerated the powers of their new champion with all the seal of party."

Whilst such was the reception of the Vindicise Gallices at home, it may well be believed that it was received with at least equal enthusiasm in France; the Duke of Drieene (afterwards Louis Philippe) translated the greater just of it into French; and we know that Bonaparts, years after its publication, sounded its praises in the presence of its author. Doubtless its influence lended to the completion of some of the glodmiest predictions of Burke; and this conviction must have weighed heavily upon the conscience of the author when experience had

"I greatly admire your honesty and magnanimity in openly professing your conversion. I think I shall have the courage to initate you. I have too long submitted to mean and evasive compromises. It is my intention, in this winter's lectures, [On the law of Nature and of Nations, to profess, publicly and uncountering, that I abhor, abure, and forever renounce the Freuch Revolution, with all its sangularry history its abominable principles, and forever evertable leaders. I hope I shall be able to wipe of that disgrace of having been once bettayed into an approbation of that computers against God and man, the greatest scourge of the world, and the chief stain upon human annals."—Life of Mackinson, vol. 1. Shap. iii. To the same effect is the following, which we find re-corded in George Moore's Diary:

In Sir James's Diary, kept at Bombay, he remarks, under date of March 23, 1811:

II. MACKINTOSH THE MENTAL AND MORAL PHILO-

SOPHER.

The works of our author which claim consideration under this head are—1. Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy, chiefly during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. This was intended as a continua-tion of Dugald Stewart's unfinished dissertation, (prefixed to Encyclopedia Britannica,) Exhibiting a General View of the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Po-litical Philosophy since the Revival of Letters in Europe. Sir James's Dissertation was commenced about September, 1828, and, after many interruptions from sickness and other causes, completed in the spring of 1830. These interruptions so far curtailed the original plan that a survey of Political Philosophy, and the History of the Ethical Philosophy of the Continent, were necessarily omitted, and the original design of Stewart still remains uncompleted; for the later works in this department can hardly be said to exhaust so prolific a theme. This task was truly a labour of love to Mackintosh.

was truly a labour of love to Mackintosh.

"You will sea" he says, in a letter to Mr. Napier, (editer of the Encyc. Brit...) dated January. 1829, "I have made some (I hope useful) additions to one of the sections; and I would have made more if I could have spared the time. But, alas! I have none to spare; otherwise, I like this sort of work much better than any other."

Shortly afterwards he writes:
"I begin to hope well of my discourse, which I endeavour to make a development of ethical principles as they litstorically arces, a new attempt in our language."

Again:

"The part in which I think I have done most service is that is which I have endeavoured to slip in a foundation under Butler's doctrine of the supremety of conscience, which he left baseless."

Yet he had no has 'till in acknowledging his obliga-tions to the celebrated author of the Analogy;
"He said that 'he had learnt all his philosophy from Butler's three first Sermons."—Mackinston's Life, vol. ii, chap. vil.

To the volume from which we have just quoted we must refer the render for a lucid synopsis of Sir James's Dissertation, in a letter from his friend Sir Henry Hol-land, M.D., Those who have taken the trouble to read land, M.D. Those who have taken the trouble to read our life of Robert Hall, on a preceding page of this Dic-tionary, will have no difficulty in crediting Sir James's assertion that the study of Ethical Philosophy was "a sort of work which he liked much better than any other."

The taste which commenced perhaps almost in childhood, and was so assiduously cherished at college in fater years, softened the asperities of political partianship and beguited the tedions hours of Indian exite. He who delights to learn delights also to instruct: the overflowing river facilitates its own progress while fertilizing the banks which profit by its superfluous waters; and the clouds are no losers by the genial showers "which make glad the heart" of the husbandman and revive the face of the earth. It was pleasure in the communication of knowledge which—as we shall see presently -converted the solitary student into a public lecturer on the Laws of Nations; and it was the gratification of the same taste which nerved bim to the daily struggle against physical languor and mental distraction, as he slowly added page to page of the chrorate Dissertation on Ethical Philo-Sir James's sufficiency as a teacher of myral philosophy has not been permitted to pass unchallenged; but we can conceive of but few higher authorities on a point of this nature than Mackintosh's earliest antagenist in the arena of metaphysical discussion,-Robert Hall, of Arnaby:

I know no man,' said Hall, repeatedly and emphatically. 'equal "I know no man," said Hall, repeatedly and emphatically, 'equal to Sir James in talents. . . . His genius is best adapted for notaphysical speculation; but, had he chosen moral philosophy, he would probably have surpassed overy living writer. . . . I am persuaded that it Sir James Mackintosh had enjoyed ledsure, and had exerted himself, he would have completely outlone Jeffrey and Stewart and all the metaphysical writers of our times, "—Rec. Robert Entine's Concessations enth Libert Hall, in 1819 and 1823; Hall's Works. 11th ed., Lon. 1853, vi. 122, 123.

Lord Cockburn doubtless represents the general sentiment prevailing at the time muong scholars when he

ment prevailing at the time among scholars when he remarks that, on the retirement of Dugald Stewart in 1810 from the chair of Moral Philosophy in the Untversity of Edinburgh,

"Brown, a profound incraphysician, an enthusiast in the science of mind, and, in a peculiar way, an elequent lecturer, was perhaps the only man in the cupire, ever pt Mackintosh, who was worthy of coming after Stowatt."

Again, when Professor Brown (who was elected to fill

"He had looked into every moral and metaphysical question." says Sydney Smith, "from Plato to Paley."—Mackintoh's Lefe, says Sydney Sm vol. ii. chap. vui.

Robert Hall's earnest desire was partially gratified by the appearance of the Dissertation; and he commended it in unequivocal terms. We are told in Sir James's life

"He recurred with evident satisfaction to the good opinion which Robert Hall had expressed of his Ethical Dissertation."—Vol. il.

Robert Hall had expressed of his Ethical Dissertation."—Vol. il. chap. vil.

It is known that the Dissertation was attacked with much severity by Mr. James Mill, in his Fragment on Mackintosh, pub. anonymously in 1835. Professor Wilson, also, uses no measured language in his censures on the Dissertation, (Blackwood's Mag., xxviil. 586-587;) and the forvid eulogy of De Quincey (Essays on Philosophical Writers) is comewhat chilled by the searching ventilation to which portions of the treatise are exposed. The opinion of Dr. Chalmers on this subject will justly

The opinion of Dr. Chalmers on this subject will justly earry great weight:

"I have often regretted the distraction to which Sir James's mind was exposed through life between politics and literature; and the regret has been much enhanced by my late perusal of his admirable Essay on Ethical science—a production which has convinced me how mightily, if in possession of unbounded leisure, he would have enriched the philosophy of our age."—Mackinch's Life, vol. ii. chap. viii.

Alexander H. Everett, (see N. Amer. Rev., xxxv. .51;) whilst doing full justice to the merits of the Dissertation, instances as grave faults,—heaty proparation, the absence of any notice of the ethical theories of the modern Germans, the almost total silence respecting the French philosophers, and the very partial survey even of the English metaphysicians.

"Notwithstanding these deficiencies," he continues, "it will be read with deep interest by students of moral science, and by all who take an interest in the higher departments of intellectual research or enjoy the beauties of elegant language applied to the libertation of "divide philosophy." It gives us, on an important branch of the most important of the sciences, the reflections of one of the few master-minds that are fitted by original capacity and patient study to probe it to the bottom. . . The articles on Bentham, Stewart, and Brown are the lengust and most clahorate in the work. They will amply reward the classest attention."

Mr. Everett proceeds to notice Mackintosh's important peculiarity in the supposition "that Conscience, or the March Faculty, in not an original part of our constitution."

Moral Faculty, is not an original part of our constitution, but a 'secondary formation,' created at a later period of life, by the effect of Association of Ideas, out of a variety of elements existing in the mind."

We lack both space and time to venture, "like Pyrrho, on the sea of speculation," or rather on the metaphysical battle-field, to which these ancient war-ories invite us; and we content ourselves, without expressing any opinion of our own upon this recrate quantie, with quoting a few of the concluding lines of Sir Henry flolland's synopsis of the Dissertation, to which we have on a preceding page called the attention of the curious reader:

called the attention of the curious reader:

"I will increly affirm that nowhere is the highest ground of moral action more distinctly assumed or more completely vindicated, nowhere are its relations to the well-being of man more beautifully exemplified, than in the work which I have ventured thus briefly and imperfectly to analyse."

"It cannot be doubted," remarks for Henry, on a preceding page,
"that the form under which this Dissertation was published, as one of a series of discourses profixed to an edition of the 'Encyclopadia Britannica,' contributed further (see Sft Henry's preliminary remarks) to keep it from the general knowledge of the world. Nor has this obstacle been yet removed by any separate form of publication."

This may remind the reader of a passage in the Port-felio of a Man of the World:

Sir James said that he and all the writers ever employed in those Supplements thought it a great compliment to be asked to do them. I said, 'You might as well have put dray's County Church, and by Johnson's Dichomary, under the world Church, and expect it to be Among important contributions to the literature of Ethical Philosophy are to be classed Sir James's two papers on Stewart's Preliminary Dissertation to the Encyclopmdia Britannica. These admirable cesays will be found in the Edinburgh Review, vols. xxvii. 180-244. xxxvi. 220-267. A few pages extracted from these papers, and entitled On the Philosophical Genius of Lord Basea and Mr. Locke, will be found in Mackintosh's Works, ed,

"It is chiefly as a moralist." remarks a late commentator on speculative philosophy, "that Sir James Mackintosh stood preeminent; and the ardour, the depth, and the learning with which he combated the selfish systems and pleaded for the authority and sancity of the moral faculty in man contributed perhaps more than any single cause not of a r. ligious nature, to oppose the build advances of utilizariasism and nimes a lishthist ton into the moral principles of the country. Without signifying our silherence to his peculiar theory respecting conscience, we still report like thoughts and speculiations as taking eminently the right direction; and, had he obtained leisure to mature his views and give them to, the world in his own foreible and glowing style, it is the opinion of some best able to judge upon the subject (c.g. Robert Hall and Dr. Chaimers) that he would have placed the whole theory of morals upon a higher and mora commanding position than it had ever occuping "white in this country."—Norell's Effet, and Ord.

View of the Speculative Philosophy of Europe in the Nineteenth Century, chap. v. section 1. Under this division of our subject we may perhaps properly include (2.) Discourse on the Law of Nature and Nations, already referred to as the preliminary lecture of nations, already referred to as the preliminary lecture of a course on this subject delivered at Lincoln's Inn Hall in the spring of the year 1299. The title of this Discourse would justify us in placing it under the head either of Political Philosophy or Moral Philosophy, whilst the author's definition of his theme as conversant with the application of the "rules of morality," &c. protests the classification which we have calcuted from all tects the classification which we have selected from all reasonable censure. It is a striking proof of the very small number of minds to which topics of this important character successfully appeal, that, notwithstanding the praise which has been lavished on the Introductory Discourse, the public was content to let more than a quarter of a century clapse (1799 to 1828) before the second edition was demanded. We may here appropriately introduce a notice of the American edition, edited by Mr J G. Marvin, (Bort., 1843, 8vo,) which is enriched by a Liet of Works upon International Law, and a sketch of the author's life. A strong temptation is presented to linger for a few moments, or a few pages, over a description of the distinguished auditory who sought knowledge at the lecturer's lips, and of the indignation of a portion of his hearers when they heard the doctrines of corservation preached by the late republican, and the philosophic author of The Reflections quoted in terms of unmeasured enlogy by the same apostle of liberty who had attacked him with such vigour in the Vindicias Gallicas. But moments and pages are both scarce with us, and we push forward. A few graphic lines from Hazlitt (an unexceptionable witness in this case) may be accepted as a fair representation of the deep disgust excited among the radicals by this unlooked-for and to them mortifying spectanle:

"He grew whemer with success Dazzing others by the bulliancy of his acquirements, davied hunself by the admination they excited, he look tear as well as prudence, dard every thing store him. The Modern Philosophy—counter scarp, outworks, cristed and all—fell without a blow by the "whiff and wind of his lell dostrins," as if it had been a pack of carle The volume of the French Revolution was seen expiring in its own flames, like a bondre made of straw the frinciples of Reform were scattered in all directions, like chair before the keen northern blast. He laid about him like one inspired nothing could withstand his envenomed touth. As to our vigionary akepties and 'tropian philosophus, they stood no charies with our lecturer he did not 'carre them as a deh fit for the (tota), but he wait them as a care use it for hounds." Five years after the delivery of these famous lectures, Mackintosh has no difficulty in acknowledging that his political conversion—doubtless greatly owing to his celebrated conference with Edunind Burke in 1796—was proaulgated in a creed from which his cooler judgment was

I can easily so that I rebounded from my original equalions too far towards the opposite extreme. I was carried the far by anxiety to stone for my former errors. I since Mackintosh, of late years so distinguished in Parliament as a firend to liberty, to see nee and liberal institutions, and who is at the same time a most humane and philosophical jurist, has in his incompasa bile Introductory Descurere to his Lectures on the Law of Nations given us a finished specimen of the advantages resulting from the mestery of foreign public writers. It would perhaps be difficult to whet from the whole mass of modern literature a discusse of equal length which is so just and beautiful so userate and profound so captivating and enlight imag, so curched with the refinements of modern learning and the simple gradeur of meant principles. This, onevery account, is forever to be lamented: no one over had access to such materials or was so fitted to use them.'—Notes to Lects. V., VI. on Mod. Hist.

Neither of these remarks can now be repeated. Macaulay has added the collections of his predecessor to the vast materials accumulated by his own untiring industry, and has already chronicled a portion of the His-tory of England in a manner to which neither Sir James Mackintosh nor any writer of the day could make even

"I take this opportunity," writes Mr. Macaulay, "of expressing my warm gratitude to the family of my dear and honoured friend, Sir James Mackintosh, for confiding to me the materials collected by him at a time when he meditated a work similar to that which I have undertaken. I have never seen, and I do not believe that there anywhere causte, within the same compass, so noble a collection of extracts from public and private archives. V. MACKINTOSH THE ORATORS
It requires little memerity to hazard the remark that Mackintosh the parliamentary speaker never equalled Mackintosh the advecate of Jean Peltier. The expectations of the public were high when the relebrated pleuder took his seat in the House of Commons: he soon gave notice of a motion on the cession of Norway to Sweden; "The crush was great to hose him and the dread of the ministry was not a little, for the fame of his knowledge and cloquence was high."

He made a learned speech, a philosophical speech, but not one of the kind that carries the hearer away with the

His luminous and philosophical disquisition on the Roform Bill was gasken to capty benches. . His takents were not those which enables a peaker to produce with rapidity a series of striking but transitory impressions,—to excite the minds of five hundred gentlemen at midnight, without saying any thing that any one of them will be able to remember in the morning. —T. It cannot be denied that, whenever the nature of the subject and the disposition of the House were favourable to his qualities as a speaker, he oximited specimens of elequence that were of the highest order and elicited the most ampalified applause."—Sig JAMES SCARLETT, (LOAD ABMESE; Life of Mackinsche, vol. ii. chap. t.

VI. MACKINTORH THE CONVERSATIONIST.

If Sir James did not distinguish himself by public elequence, he made ample amends by those wonderful conversational powers to which the present century has furnished no parallel. Dr. Johnson and Sir James Mackintosh were unquestionably the two greatest talkers. Mackintorh were unquestionably the two greatest talkers of whom English annals present any record. Coleridge was a preacher, Burks a preceptor, Lamb a punster, Hook an epigrammatiet, Sydney Smith a wit, and Charles Mathews a wag; but Johnson and Mackintosh were talkers. We regret that our limited space prevents our doing full justice to Mackintosh's remarkable colloquial

All talents; but some testimonics must be adduced:

"Tile subdued by age and illness, his conversation was more brilliant and instructive than that of any human being I ever like the lood fortune to be acquainted with. His memory (rank and prodigious as it was) he so managed as to make it a source of pleasure and instruction, rather than that dreadful engine of sel loquist oppression into which if is sometimes specied. He remains before things, words, thoughts, dates, and every thing that was wanted. Its language was beautiful, and might have going time.

"Of all those whose conversation is referred to by Moore. Str James Mackintonb was the ablest, the most brilliant, and the best-following. ... Ills stores of learning were vest, and of those kinds, which, buth in serious and hight conversation, are must available... .? This information, too, which no-book or number of books of reference would have given, was conveyed in the easy language of gopversation, had with the unissuming tone of an equal and a companion. Indeed, his mind seemed to comprehend in distinct but harmonious method the whole history of human thought, from the entilest speculations of the friends of Job to the latest subtleties of the disciples of Kant... Thus endowed, conversation was his favourite employment and his chips seduction."—Long John Bussetti: Pref. to Tom Moore's Memoirs, 1853, vi., xi., xii.

"The charms of his conversation, the pleasure and the instruction which were found in his society, can be appreciated by contemporaries only, who epiloyed the opportunity of uncorcourse with him. . . . In the more unmixed circles of his society, almost every subject of letters and metaphysics was freely discussed; and in every discussion Mr. Mackintosh bore an eminent part, not only, for knowledge and senteness, but for a spirit of candour and a love of truth which were ever with him paramount to the desite of victory."—Sh JAMES SCALLET, (LODD Aginces): Mackinsk's Life, vol. it, chap. iv.

The reader may remember Hazlitt's comparison between the colloquial talent of Mackintosh and Coloridge: we quote a few lines:

and Coloridge: we quote a few lines:

and Coleridge: we quote a few lines:
 "They have nearly an equal range of reading and of topics of sonversation: but in the mind of the one we see nothing but factures; in the other every thing is fluid. The ideas of the one are as formal and tangible as those of the other are shadow, and evanescent. Sir James Mackintesh walks over the ground; Mr.
Coleridge is always flying off from it. The first knows all that has been said upon a subject; the last has something to say that was never said perors. . The conversation of Sir James Mackintesh has the effect of reading a well-written book; that of his friend is like hearing a bewildering dream. The one is an Encyclopedia of

The superlovity of Sir-James Mackintosh to Jerrey in conversation was then very manifest. His ideas succeeded such other much more rapidly: his expressions were more brief and terse, his repartee most felicitous. Jerreys great taleast consisted in amplification and illustration, and there he was eminently great; and he had been accustomed to Edinburgh society, where he had been allowed by his admiring auditors, male and symals, to preject and expand all billium. Sir James had not greater quickness of mind,—for nothing could axosed Jedrey in that respect—but much greater power of condensed expression, and infinitely more rapidity in changing the subject of conversation. "Tout toucher, rien approfondir was his practice, as it is of all men in whom the real conversational talent axists, and where it has been trained to perfection by frequent collision, in polished society, with equal or superior men and signant and charming women. In his most familiar talk there was no wildness, no inconsistency, no amusing nonsense, no exaggeration for the sake of momentary effect. His judgments on men, on sects, on books, had been often and carefully tested and weighed, and had then been committed each to its proper receptacle in the most capacious and accurately-constructed memory that any human being ever possessed. It would have been strange, indeed, if you had asked for any thing that was not to be found in that immense warehouse.

After listening to copious quotations from Sir James in German, French, and English, the Man of the World ben ly his steps homeward, lost in wonder at the exhibition he had witnessed, and, after examining his books to verify the quotations, thus registers the result of his investigations :

"Looked in Browne, &c. when I got home, for all the quotations Sir James had made: properties for proprieties in Sir Thomas Browne: 'draw from heaven,' instead of 'pull,' in Jame Shore; and a few words left out in Lord Grenville's preface; but all the rest, as far as I can remember, was, word for word, quoted exactly."—P. 550. more enthusiastic than Madame de Stäel, who seems to have deemed his conversational eloquence but one degree short of inspiration:

"She looked for his colloquial powers wherever she went, and had almost persuaded herself that his presence was indispensable to her complete enjoyment of society in England. "Je ne puls trop yous dire à quel point j'al besoin de vous partont, et plus encore dans cette belie liste of je sens si fort le maque des asurvonirs. Pour vous il me semble que, si je vous retrouvois, tant j'ai la flerté de penser que nos pensers et nos sentiments sout d'avcord.' Speaking of a dinner where she had not met him, she said, 'Nous avons diné chez Ward, male vous y brillier commo les linages de Brutns et Cassius: il n'y a pas de societé lei sans vous. Ce n'est pas que Ward n'ait été alimable tont-h'ait; mais il préchoit un peu dans le d'essert. Such were not the passing feelings of the day; and towards the close of her life, when no ideas save those that partake of the lofty and the durable—such as were likely to have been associated with the remembrance of her friend—readily present themselves, she wrote to him, 'lien n'est changé dans mes sentimens pour tout ce qui m'est cher: je vous prie de vous y comprendre au premier rang.—comme en toutes choses vous ètes au premier rang. In speaking of him to others this accomplished woman

Madame de Stael used to extol him to the skies, and was perfectly Madamo de Sikel used to extol him to the skies, and was perfectly sincers in her admiration of him,—which was not the case with all whom she probed. Mackintosh also praised her; but his is a mind that, as Moore writes, 'rather loves to praise than blame,' for, with a judgment so comprehensive, a knowledge so general, and a crifical acumen narely to be met with, his sentences are never sovers. He is a powerful writer and speaker: there is an earnestness and vigour in his style, and a force and purity in his language, equally free from inflation and loquedty,'—Counters of Blessington's Conversations with Lord Byron.

On another occasion Byron characterizes Mackintosh as

"So mighty and so gentle too."

Again, in his Diary in 1813, he registers the receipt of a very handsome note from Mackintosh, who is a rare instance of the union of very transcendent talent and great good nature," and, in the same year, thus responds to an invitation from the object of such enthusiastic admiration:

"DEAR SIR JAMES:
"I was to have left London on Friday, but will certainly remain a day longer (and believe I would a year) to have the honour of meeting you."

A few months since, when listening with great pleasure at "Sunnyside" (the romantic residence of the author of The Sketch-Book) to Mr. Washington Irving's reminiscences of some of the eminent characters with whom he had associated in the early part of the present century, we asked him if the conversational powers of Sir. James Mackintosh appeared to him so remarkable as they were generally represented. He replied in the affirmative. To a subsequent request that he would favour us with some written recollections of Sir James, we received the following response:

"SUNNYSIDE, Sept. 7th, 1857.

"MY DEAR SIR "Mr Dean Sire:
"I regret that I can furnish you with nothing worthy of record with regard to Sir James Mackintoch. It is now nearly thirty years since I enjoyed an intercourse with him: and, though I well remember the engaging charms of his kind and genial manners and the delights of his conversation, my treacherous memory retains nothing but general impressions.

"With great regard,
"Yours, very truly,
"Washington Irving.

A similar request addressed to Mr. Edward Everett elicited the following:

" MEDFORD, MASS., 28 August, 1857.

"DEAR SIR:

"Dear Sin:

"I have yours of the 25th: the following slight reminiscences will perhaps answer your purpose:

"On one occasion I was slone with Sir James Mackintosh, for some time, in the library of Holland House, when the conversation turned principally on Burke's oratory. I saked him whether his recollection confirmed the tradition that it sometimes empitied the seats in the House of Commons. Sir James said it certainly did at times, especially after the rupture with Fox. A volume of Burke lay on the table; and, in a pause of the conversation, Sir James took it up and read the famous passage about common language and kindred blood, in the speech on Confliction with America. He read in an animated but somewhat formal and monotonous manner. When he had finished the passage, I saked him whether words like those ever emptied the seate of the British House of Commons. He brought his hand vidently to his thigh and said, 'It is impossible.'

"Sir James, as is well known, gave offence to some of his political friends by what they unjustly deemed his apostacy from liberal principles. The following amusing anecdote is excusionally repeated in London. I heard it fold at a dimerparty, by the lat Hishop of London, (Dr. Blomfield.) who, in telling it, imitated Dr. Parr also was present, allading to one of the victims, [Quigley,] said 'he was the worst of men." Dr. Parr paused a moment, to construct a sentence, and then said, 'No, Sir James; he was a brishman; he might have been a lawyer; he was a traitor; Sir Jadies, he might have been a lawyer; he was a traitor; Sir Jadies, he might have been a lawyer; he was a traitor; Sir Jadies, he might have been an apostate;—the latter part of the sentence bulng spoken with a fixed look at Sir James.

"I am, dear sir, with much regard,
"Sincorely, yours,"

VII. MACKINTOSH'S MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL CHA-ACTERISTICS.

"His nierit and his pretensions," says Lord Abinger, "bave placed him—and will maintain him with posterity—in a position far above those who were engaged in the petty strife of party and the contentions for power. His genha and his talents will shed a lustre over the age in which he lived when his more fortunate the contentions for power. His genius and his taionts will shed a instre over the age in which he lived when his more formaste competitors are forgotten. As an elegant writer, a consummate master of metaphysics and moral philosophy,—as a profound his torian,—as an accomplished orator,—he will be known to all future times. . . . The highest praise of Sir James Mackintosh is that he was, by disposition and nature, the advocate of truth. . . No mare ever lived more in society, or show more in conversation; yet it would be difficult—I should say impossible—to accribe a sentiment, or even an original sentence, to him the least tinctured with cuvy, willie outly not hate: he did not know how to set about it. The guil-bhadder was omitted in his composition; and, if he could have been persuaded into any scheme of revenging himself upon an enemy, I am sure (unless he had been narrowly watched) it would have ended in proclaiming the good qualities and promoting the interests of his adversary. . . A high merit in Sir James Mackintosh was hareal and unaffected philauthropy. He did not make the improvement of the great mass of markind an engine of popularity and a stepping stone to power; but he had a genuine love of human happiness. . . When I turn from living spectacles of stupidity, ignorance, and malice, and wish to think better of the world. I remember my great and benevolent friend Mackintosh,—akee, Expexy Surue: bid., vol. ii. chap, viii.

Markintosh,"—IRV. Synky Shirn: bid., vol. ii. chap. vili.

As an evidence of his "real and unaffected philanthropy," we may point to the fact that "He gave the most efficient support to Sir S. Romilly's exertions for the improvement of the criminal law, and, after the death of that admirable person, became the leader in that most necessary and unexceptionable branch of reform.... The honourable place which his name must ever hold as the associate of Romilly in the great and humane work of ameliorating our criminal law."—Long

"His range of study and speculation," remarks Lord Joffrey in another place, "was nearly as large as that of Bacon; and there were, in fact, but five branches of learning with which he was not familiar. But in any attempt at delineating his intellectual character, it is necessary to bear in unind that his mastery was in mental philosophy, not merely in its metaphysical departments, but in its still more important application to conduct and affairs, and in their higher branches of politios and legislation, which derive their proofs and principles from history and give authority to its lessons in return.

"Upon all these subjects he was probably the most learned man of his age; and in maturing and digesting his views of them I am persuaded that there have been few, in any age, who ever brought a more powerful and disciplined understanding to bear, with so much candour, caution, and modesty, upon so large a collection of materials.

It is milder virtues rewarded themselves. The most placable of men turned all his enemies into friends; and he who valued the kindness of others beyond all other possessions, sied rich in the treasure he valued."—Machindaik Life, vol. ii. chap, viii.

"Literary criticiem, in that more enlarged same which bleads the subject with the style and genius of the author, was the passion of his mind. His discrimination devoted to this object was equally powerful and acute. He gave to the faculty a sort of metaphysical character by the subtlety with which he exercised it, both in his conversation and writings.

Dryden hes said that it was more easy for him to write severely than to write genity, Hagould not readily bring himself to blane.

His praise was not for him to write severely than to write genity, Hagould not readily bring himself to blane.

His praise was reviewer the same temper will be found throughout,—little in accordance, it must be owned, with the critical fashton of the time; yet not the least to be esteeme yet not the less to be exteemed as a trace in sus personnel value.—Johl., vol. it. chap. vii.

"No loss can be so great (:) the literary world. His understanding was of so superior a quality, his memory so automisting, and his disposition so truly convictous and obliging, that he was always willing to instruct every person who approached him. And, on every occasion, his entire sympathy with the great interiors of mankind, and his enlightened comprohension of them, were distinctly marked. He was one of those whom, for the benefit of others, one could have wished exempt from the common lot of humanity. .One could have wished exempt from the common lot of humanity. .One could have said to him, as the Persians to their king, 'Live Sorever!' He should have been exempted, too, from the doment cares of our existence, and, instead of having to make provision for the day that was going over him should have had nothing to do but to read, to think, and to write. Men of these great intellectual powers should not, like their fabbid prototype, be chained to their rock, with the vultures to tent them. Some papers remain, which will afford a meisncholy indication of what, under favourable circumstances, he might have done; what he has done, however, is of great value, and will live. He can be properly estimated only by those who were fortunate enough to know him."—PROP. Sarri, of Cundridge: Appendix to his Lects. (Notes on V., VI.) on Mod. First.

To a mind thus singularly endowed-uniting profound erudition with accuracy of judgment, and possessing a remarkable skill in the detection of error and ascertainment of truth-we need hardly say that the evidences of Christianity appealed with peculiar force and commanded a ready assent. At home and abroad, the object of attraction to those whose notice is most courted, surrounded by rank and fashion, by beauty and by fame, he seems never to have lost that childlike humility and tenderness of heart which elicited the veneration of his admirers and the love of his friends.

During his last illness, he addressed himself to the great work of preparation for eteraity with the calmness of the philosopher and the fervour of the saint. He felt that the command had gone forth—"Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live"—which startled the king in his palace when death was the farthest from his thoughts: -not, like that king, seeking a prolongation of his

but—not, like that king, seeking a prolongation of his earthly term—he delayed not to obey the mandate.
"His children," remarks one of his family, who ministered to his last hours, "were continually the objects of his thoughts, as was manifested from his frequently speaking of them. At other times he would speak of flod with more reverence and awe than I have almost ever met with. His voice fell; his whole person seemed to how down, as if conscious of a superior presence; while in a suddend, solemn, deeply-thoughtful manner, he slowly expressed himself. . . At another time he told me that, during the many sleepless nights he passed, the contemplation of the character of Jesus Christ, and thoughts concerning the gospel, with prayer to God, rese his chief occupation. . . Whenever a word from the Scriptures was repeated to him, he always manifested that he heard to am of Josus Christ, if his ever were closed, he always consord scriptures was reposted to hist, he always manifested that he heard it; and I especially observed that, at every mention of the name of Josus Christ, if his eyes were closed, he always opened them and looked at the person who had spoken. I said to him at one time; 'Josus Christ loves you,' he answered, slowly, and pausing between such word. 'Josus Christ—love—the same thing.' He attricted these last words with a most sweet smile."

The sad news of the death of this illustrious person, who had filled so large a place in the public estimation for many years, produced a profound sensation through the learned circles of Great Britain,—and, indeed, throughtagearned erices of Great Diritals,—and, indeed, throughout Europe. It was felt that a great light had been extinguished; and Science, Philosophy, and Letters mourned a loss which the lapse of many ages might hot supply. It was felt—to berrow the language of a distinguished scholar, who thus gave utterance to the convictions of many sorrowing hearts-that

"Me Macture appears to be very thoroughly conversant with his subjet t, and to have studied with great attention the geological attention of a considerable part of Europe. He is a disciple of Wernerr but we recognise him as such more by the descriptive language he employs than by his theoretical opinions. His general views are rauch more epiarged and philosophical than are usually met with in geologists of that school, and, like most of those who have had opportunities of extensive observation, he has found that the theory of the Freyburg professor is of a very limited application. The following remarks in his Preface are a sufficient proof that his geological creed is not that of Werner.—Bein. Re., xxx. 185, g.

MacMichael, Morton, b. in Burlington county,
New Jersey, Oct. 1, 1807, one of the most eminent of American orators, sas connected as a contributor with almost all of the periodicals—monthly, weekly, and delly—nested in Philadelphia from 1824 to 44. Since 1844 he has been exclusively occupied with the editorial duties of the North American newspaper. A specimen of his poetry—a monody—will be found in The Philadelphia Book, 1836, 200. We know of but few productions more justly entitled to warm commendation. It is to be regretted that so able a master of the language should not devote his leisure hours to the preparation of some work of permanent interest and worthy of his genius.

Francis's biographical account of MacNelle is incorrect in several particulars: corrections of his errors will be found in Dubl. Univ. Mag., xxix. 471. Dr. Tyng describes a sermon of Dr. MacNeile's as combining, in an extraordinary degree, "unrivalled excel-lencies of subject, mind, and matter;" and the author of Pen-Pictures of Popular English Preachers remarks that

Dr. Francis Lieber, in a letter to the Autor of this Dictionary, 19th May, 1857.

Macpherson, James, M.D., 1738-1796, a native of Odlege and Marischal College, Aberdeen, and at the University of Edinburgh; was intended for the Church, -although it is doubtful whether he ever received holy orders. He acted for some time as the teacher's Pattern. orders. He acted for some time as the teacher of Ruthven Behool, and subsequently as a private tutor; in 1764 accompanied Governor Johnson to Pensacola, Florida, as private secretary; about 1780 was rewarded for his services as a political pamphleteer by being appointed agent to the Nabob of Arout, and was returned to Parliament in 1780, '84, and '90. His first attempt at composition gave little os, and we. His are steempt at composition gave little promise of the literary ability displayed in the authorship or editorship of Ossian. It was an Heroic Poem in 6 Cantos, pub. in 1758, 12mo, entitled The Highlander, and is admitted to be beneath criticism. Whilst aturer in the family of Mr. Graham, of Balgowan, Macpherson exhibited ramily of Mr. Granam, of Daugowan, Maconerson exhibited to John Home, the author of Douglas, what he styled Translations of Fragments of Gaelie Poetry, such as were still rested by the inhabitants of the Highlands. Home sommunicated this statement to others, and his friends Blair, Carlyle, and Ferguson urged Macpherson not to conceal such treasures, but to publish them to the world. Accordingly, Macpherson pub., in 1760, Fragments of Ancient Poetry, collected in the Highlands of Scotland and translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language. This book excited much attention, and a subscription was entered into to enable the editor to travel in the Highlands and collect all that he would find of these precious relies. The results of this mission were given to the public in two vols.,—vis. : 1. Fingal; an Aucient Poem, in Six Books, together with several other Poems composed by Ossian, son of Fingal, trans. from the Gaelic language, Lon., 1762, 4to. 2. Temora; an Ancient Epic Poem in Fight Books, together with several Poeus, composed by Ossian, son of Fingal, trans. from the Gaelic Language, 1763, 4to. These volumes (by which the author or editor pocketed £1200) were recoived with enthusiastic applause, and in less than a year after their first appearance were translated into almost every language of Europe. We have already had oc-casion to notice two of the best of the edits, pub. in England, (see Laing, Malcoln, M.P., No. 2; MacFarlane, ROBERT, No. 3,) and a number of the controversial publications elicited by this wonderful discovery.(?) When Johnson paid his famous visit to the Rebrides, he took pains to examine the question for himself, and communicated the results of his investigations in very decided terms:

I hope I shall never be deterred from detecting what I think a cleat by the meances of a raffian. What would you have me retract! I thought your book an imposture: I think it an imposture still. Machherson found that there was nothing to be made Macpherson found that there was nothing to be made Macpherson found that there was nothing to be made by quarrelling with the philosopher of Bolt Court, and wisely left him to ridicule Ossian at his pleasure. Lurd Macaulay remarks (Life of Johnson, in Encyc. Ossian, declares that "Dear, nevertheless, to every Scottish heart will forever remain those beautiful fragments. In spite of Dr. Johnson's criticism, and the more insolent one of Macaulay, they will continue to hear in the monotony of the strain the voice of the mountain-torrent and the rear of the tempost," &c.

Lord Brougham, referring to the indignation excited Amono the Scottal by the amblication of Johnson's stric-among the Scotch by the publication of Johnson's strictures, remarks, "Had he only believed in 'Ossian's Poems,' nothing would ever have been heard but satisfaction with the 'Journey' and respect for its author. His opinion was strong, his arguments were powerful; he plainly gave the right mane to an attempt at deciving which had failed with him; it was highly offensive to those concerned in the fabrication and it was somewhat disreputable to their dupes: his unqualified opinion remained unrefuted; his arguments are to this day unanswered, and the believers found it more easy to rail at him than to refute."—Luces of Mon of Letters of the Time of George III.: Johnson: ed. Lon. and Glasg., 1855, 350-300.

The sulogies of the oritic of the Eclectic Review may temind the reader of Sir Walter Scott's early enjoyment of Ossian:

of Ossian :

of Ossian:

"You recall to me some very pleasant feelings of my boyhood when you ask my opinion of Ossian.... Ossian and Spenser were two books which the old bard [Dr. Blacklock] put into my hands, and which I devoured rather than perused. Their tales were for a long time so much my delight that I could repeat without remorso whole Cantos of the one and Duans of the other; and we to the unlocky wight who undertook to be my sudder, for in the height of my enthusiasen I was spit to disregard all hints that my recitations became tollous."—Letter of Miss Seward: Lockhart's Left of $\frac{8}{8}\text{cot}$, Abotaford ed. $\frac{1}{8}\text{dim}_1 \text{1850}, 128.

Dr. Parr speaks much to the same effect:

Dr. Part speaks much to the same effect:

"I read this book when a boy, and was enamoured with it. When college I again read Ossian with increased delight. I now, at though convinced of the imposture, find pleasure in reading Machine Particular."—Bibliothera Particular.

Professor Wilson also admits that he once thought that "Homer and Virgil, though the gods of our young delatry,—sunbright both in the golden morn of our imagination,—were not greater or more glorious orbs of song than our own ossian. Was that belief delusion all? Are the souge of Schna but unmeaning words,—idle as the inarticulate winds, the murnurs of the Harp and Volce of Count? Let us return, if we can, to our old creed; let us shiper, if we can, the folly of wisdom," &c.—Hackw. Mag., zivi. 683, Nov. 1839.

"In our own country," proceeds Wilcon, "one seldom now hears the name; and the rant, bombact, and fustian of Macpherson have long been the ridicile, not generly of our critics, but of some of our greatest living poets. Wordsworth even waxes witty, and exclaims, "All hail, Macpherson! hall to thee, sire of Oscian."

Wilson remarks, in an annusing letter to Hogg, written many years before the preceding, Professor Wilson also admits that he once thought that

Wilson remarks, in an amusing letter to Hogg, written many years before the preceding, "If Cestan did write the poems attributed to him, or any poems like them, he was a dull dog, and deserved never to taste whiskey as long as he lived. A man that lives forever amongenists and mountains knows botter than to be a ways procing about them. Metaliaks I feel about objects similiar to infancy and machood; but when we speak of them it is only upon great occasions and in situations of deep passion. Ossiah was probably born in a flat country." stratum.

Whaving bed the good fortune to be born and reared in a mountainous country, from my very childhood I have felt the falsebood that pervades the volumes imposed upon the world under the name of Ossian. From what I saw with my own eyes, I knew that the imagery was spurious,"

Upon this Henry Neele remarks, with some acuteness,

"This objection, however, cuts both ways: these Poems were written, if not by Oesian, by Macpherson, who was himself a llightandor."—Lett.or Emplish Poetry, Lect. 111. 7.4.

That so rigid a critic as Gray should have been a cliever in Ossian is certainly not a little surprising. Hume the historian, a man of much less critical acumen in puetry, could write to Gibbon,

"I see you entertain a great doubt with regard to the authenticity of the puems of Oseian. You are certainly right in so doing. It is indeed strange that any men of some could have imagined it posindeed strange that any men of sonse could have imagined it pos-sible that above twenty thousand verses, along with numberless historical facts, could have been preserved by oral tradition during-fifty generations, by the rudest, perhaps, of all the European na-tions, the most necessitous, the most turbulent, and the most unsettled. Where a supposition is so contrary to bommon sense, any positive evidence of it ought never to be regarded. Her run with great avidity to give their evidence in favour of what flatters their passions and their national prejudices. You are therefore over-and-shove indulgent to us in speaking of the matter with hesitation."—Elinburgh, 18th March, 1776: Gibbon's Memoirs, ed. Lon., 1837, 34-95. . 1837, 94-95.

This may remind the render of Churchill's lines:

"Ossian, sublimest, simplest bard of all, Whom English infidels Macpherson call."

Hume speaks of men running to give evidence: but what were the results of the laborious investigations of

the Committee of the Highland Society?

"The Highland Society have lately set about Investigating—or, rather, I should say, collecting—materials to detend the authenticity of Ossan. Those researches have only proved that there were no real originals—neing that word as is commonly inderstood—to be found for them... I am compelled to admit that incalculably the greater part of the English Ossian must be ascribed to Machenish, and that his whole introductions, notes, &c. &c. are an absolute fissue of forgerles."—Nik Walter Scott: Life, 128.

Scott proceeds to remark :

Unly they all allow that Macpherson's translation is very unsithful, and some pretend to say inferior to the original. . . . But all agree as to the gross infidelity of Macpherson as a translation and clitor."—Ibid., 128, 283.

"With regard to the authenticity of these Poems as a whole," Famarks Dr. Watt. "there has been much discussion, and the question remains, at present, in a great manner sub judicio; but that such a person as Ossian existed, and the heroes he celebrates, and that many parts of his Poems are preserved as traditionary among the Highlands of Scotland, has been attested on the fullest and most indubitable evidence."—Bibl. Bril., 1828.

"It is yet a question," says Allan Cunningham, "how much of these works belongs to antiquity: the names, many of the actions, and some of the composition, have been proved of old date."—Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the List Fifty Fears, 1833.

But Malcolm Laing's overwhelming charge (whi supra) dealt conflusion to the ranks of the adherents of Ossian.

The usual equanimity of the amiable Blair rises into and usual equanimity of the amisure piner these enthusiasm when the good doctor was luxuriating in the mystic fervour of the Son of Fingal; and he does not hesitate to declare that to Ossian "we may boildy assign

6. Original Papers: containing the Secret History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover: to which are prefixed Extracts from the Life of James II., as written by himself, Lou., 1775, 2 vols. 4to. This work is condemned for unfaithfulness by Professor Smyth, and from his comments we have given an extract, (see Carte, Thomas, p. 316 of this Dictionary;) but the historical student must peruse the whole of his criticism in the Lects. XVIII. and XXIII. on Modern Yet Macpherson's State Papers contain much of value, and must not be denied a place in the historical library.

We have referred to his political pamphlets; and there is one which, as an Americau, we presume we ought to mention at least by name,—The Rights of Great Britain Asserted against the Claims of the Colonies: being an Answer to the Declaration of the General Congress, 1776, 8vo. Notwithstanding Mr. Macpherson's indignation, the "Colonies" persisted in their unreasonable "claims."
May the time be far distant when the voice of international discord shall be heard in the councils of either country, when any "root of bitterness" springing up shall disturb the peace of those whose highest prosperity depends so greatly upon relations of amity and good will.

"The object of this work is to show that the world has hitherte laboured under a profound mistake respecting the Hebrew word given as 'Jehovah' in the 01d Testament. The author undertakes to prove, by a historice-philological argument, that it was not 'Jehovah,' but Yoreh; that it does not mean 'I am,' (self-existence,) but 'He who Will Be. or Come,' (The Deliverer;) in short, that the Jehovah' of the 01d Testament and the 'Christ' of the New denote one and the same being.'

Jehovah of the Old Testament and the 'Christ' of the New denote one and the same being.'

'The argument is altogether new and original, and, if valid, proves what many of the ablest theologians have believed without resting their belief upon grounds so thoroughly exagetical."—

Madison, James, 1751-1836, a native of Port Con-way, on the Rappahannock, Virginia, graduated at Prince-ton College, 1771; elected to the General Assembly of Virginia, 1776; member of the Continental Congress, 1779 to '85, and again chosen in 1786; member of the Convention which adopted the Constitution of the United States, 1787; remained in Congress until 1797; elected to the General Assembly of Virginia, 1798; an Elector in 1800; Secretary of State of the United States, 1801-09; President of the United States, 1809-17; member of the Convention to Revise the Constitution of Virginia, 1829. He was the author of twenty-nine numbers of The Federalist, already specified, (see Hamilton, Major General Alex ABBER,) and of other political papers, and noted down and left for publication the Debates of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. These De-bates, with his Correspondence, were pub. in 1840, 3 vols. 8mp. See Cillin, Henry D. A 4to vol. of Madison's Correspondence was printed by MacChire, of Washington, for private circulation. It is stated that the Hon. William C. Rives, of Virginia, will shortly publish a further collection of Madison's Papers; and a life of the author, lection of Madison's Papers; and a life of the author, from the same pen,—to be pub. by the Virginia Historical Sagiety,—is among the literary expectations of the day. There are probably enough of Mr. Madison's unpublished MSS. examt to fill twelve to fifteen octavo volumes. A grante monument to his memory—a plain obelisk, twenty feet in height—has recently (1857) been prepared at the expense of his old friends and neighbours in Orange co., Virginia. An eminent contemporary of Madison, referring to the many public positions into which the latter was called in quick succession from the period of early youth, remarks:

 "Trained in these successive schools, he acquired a habit of selfpossession which placed at ready command the rich resources of

"Of the public life of James Madison what could I say that is not deeply impresed upon the memory and upon the heart of every one within the actual of my voice? Of his private life, what but must meet an echoing shout of applause from every voice within this hall? Is it not, in a pre-eminent degree, by emanations from his mind that we are assembled here as the ropte-sentatives of the people and States of this Union? Is it not transcendently by his exertions that we address each other here by the endeaning appellation of countrymen and fellow-citizon,?"—Speech of John Quincy Adams, in the National House of Representatives, on the amountement of the death of Mr. Madison.

"Madison lacked neither ability nor inclination for speculative inquiries, and had a mind capable of enforcing the application of whatever principles he espoused. Yet his calm good sense, and the lact with which he could adapt theory to practice, were no less among his prominent characteristics."—Technor's Hist. of the Constit. of the U. Sates, I. 388.

"I entirely concur with you in your estimate of Mr. Madison,—his private virtues, his extraordinary talents, his comprehensive and statesmanlike views. To him and Hamilton, I think, we are mainly indebted for the Constitution of the United States; and in wisdom I have long been accustomed to place him before Jefferson. You and I know something more of each of them in trying times than the common politicians of our day can possibly arrive at. I wish some one who was perfectly fitted for the task would write a full and accurate biography of Madison. I tear that it can hardly be done now; for the men who best appreciated his excellences have nearly all passed away. What shadows we are?"—Judge. Nowy to Hon. Exch. Bacon, Cambridge, April 30, 1842. portion at least of these brilliant effusions:

"Seeing no hope of a republication of his writings in this country," he writes to Muckenzie, "I dismissed the matter wholly from my thought, but not without regret that no such momment should be raised to his fame and memory. I am delighted that it has fallen into such competent hands as your own to collect his works for the great American people, and I have no doubt it will far exceed any thing of the kind I could do. . . You have a glorious opportunity to edit a rure work, where you have no near of tiled before your eyes. biographical, aneedotical, and critical matter, executed with his usual crudition, good sense, and good taste.

For more than a quarter of a century, renorks Muckenzie, a the most remarkable magazine-writer of his time was the late William Magina, La.D., well known as the Sir Vorgan Odoherty of Blackwood's Magazine, and as the principal contributer for many years to Franc's and other periodicals. The combined learning, wit, eloquence, eccentricity, and humor of Vagana had obtained for him, long before his death, (in 1842) the title of The Mooran Arabicals. His naugarine-articles possess extraordinary merit. He had the art of putting a wast quantity of animal spirits upon paper: but his graver articles—which contain sound and serious principles of criticism—are carnest and well reasoned. Few men were equal to him in conversation, though he was the reverse of a great talker. It was the variety of topics upon which he threw a light, and not the diffuseness of his remarks, which gave a happy idea of the wealth of his conversation. Meet him when you might, turn the discourse into whatever channels you pleased, Maginn was a master of every subject,—the most recondite as well as the most familiar.

Alia conversation," says Kenealy, "was an outpooring of the gorgeous stores wherewith his mind was laden, and flowed on like the storted Pactolus, all golden. Whether the subject was grave or gay, lively or sevies, profound or merely eleganit, he intradint of such ambrosial ichor, he sprinkled it with such sunbright wit, as if the Muse of Comedy stood invisibly by and whispers in the little of the service of the services of one who is spell-bound by an enchanter. And yet all was so artiess, so simple, so unconcernedly delivered that it evidently required no effort of mind to enable him thus to has factive but that which you beheld was the ordinary lustre of his gladerstrading."—Dubl. Univ. Mag.

It would be easy to add to these testimonies to the remarkable powers of Dr. Maginn as a scholar, a writer.

It would be easy to add to these testimonies to the remarkable powers of Dr. Maginn as a scholar, a writer, mariance powers of Dr. magina as a scholar, a writer, and a conversationalist,—to quote Lockhart, Croker, Campbell Markensie, Maolies, and others of those who knew him in the library, the editor's office, and the drawing-room; but we have already indicated the sources of such biographical minutise, and to these our limited space biographical minutise, and to these our limited space obliges us to refer the curious reader.

"One of the most remarkable of that group of scholars and good follows ready writers, boon companious, and wits who initiated the brillian periodical literature of this age in the British islands was William Magini, Li.D., the youngest Dector of Laws ever graduated at Old Trinity. Every English periodical of mark for yours ewas sumewhat of his influence and its interset to the prompt, appions eradise, and funny pen of Magini. Now it was a paroify, and now a trebstation; to-day a critique, to-morrow a letter from Fards; one month a novel, and the next a political clear, the state of the property for the property for the property of the property of the property of the property of the property, a deligate to scholars, and an idol to his friends."

Both of these writers defend the course of Washington, and dissent in the most decided terms from his lordship's verdict. But Lord Mahou's strictures were to be subjected to a more searching examination, and tried by a judge whose critical acumen, logical skill, and dispassionate judgment were well worthy of the "high argument" which employed his pen. On the 11th of May, 1857, Major Charles Biddle—a member of the distinguished American family of this name—read before the Historical Society of Pennsylvania an elaborate review of the Andre question and the direct and collateral issues involved in its consideration. This paper was subsequently pub. in the Collections of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and in several of the periodicals of the day, among others, in The Historical Magazine (Boston, Mass.) for July, 1857. June 23th, 1857.

The London Critic of August 15, 1857. notices Major Biddle's review at some length. We give an extract:

"The Historical Society of Philadelphia has lately been occupied by the consideration of a question of some interest to us as largishmen, namely, the evenution of Major André as a spy during the great American War of Independence. In the last volume of his History of England. Lord Mahon brought against the memory of Washington a very grave charge in connection with this melaucholy event, terming it 'the greatest blot' upon the career of Washington. Zesdous to defend the character of their hero, the Americans have very naturally been indiguant at this imputation; and Major Chaltes J. Biddle, an eminent member of the abovenamed society, underlook to investigate the question and to offer the results of his researches to the society. We are not, of course, surprised that these results are altogether favourable to the American hero, but must, in justice, admit that we think that the evidence produced by Major Biddle would be sufficient to bring an English jury to the same way of thinking.

If every one had had their due, the traitor Arnold would have been given up, and then the Americans would have let André zo free. As it was, however, Washington had no alternative: the prisoner was regularly tried before a proper tribunal, and received the fate which he had incurred. Lord Mishon owes to the monory of the great American parties the reparation of an apology, or else he owes to his own fame as an histo period—the following papers: Niles's Rogis., xx. 386; New Englander, vi. 353; Amer. Whig Rev., v. 381, (Execution of André:) South. Lit. "That Lord Mahon, after acquiring high distinction as an life-torical writer, in his sative language, should have thought of composing an historical volume of four hundred pages in French, will, no doubt, excite much wonder. The carlosity of such an attempt, by a gentleman so situated is, as we have allown, unchampled among its.

"When we compare Lord Mahon's edition of these famous Letters with what we had had before, it is hardly too much to say that he has given us a new work. A very large proportion of whatever could throw light on the secret history of parties and public men in Lord Chesterfield's time—very many lotters entirely—had been omitted. The Lecanz are now filled up, and the whole illustrated by notes, brief and clear, and, wherever a judgment was called for, convey that of a segucious mind in a language as teree as the great kinsman himself could have employed, "—Quar. "This work made, when published, a powerful impression, and was supposed, for a while, to have exhausted the important department of the science of which it treats. It had, however, but fixe claims to attention on the score of originality, the fundamental principle maintained by Mr. Maithus—that population never faits, without any artificial stimulus, to rise to the level of substituce—baving been airvedy set in the clearest point of view by a great number of the most eminent writers. "The fallacy of that book is, that Mandeville defines netter vices nor benefits."—Da. JOHNSON: Boswell's Life, 1848, r. bvo, 594, q. v.
"With respect to his capital and offensive paradox, that private vices are public benefits, biandeville's whole art consists in denominating our passions by the appollation assigned to their vicious excess, and then proving them, under this donomination, useful to acciety. There is a lively force, and caustic though coarse wit, in his performance, which occasionally reminds one of Paine."—Oreen's Didny of a Lover of Life, Ipswich, 1810, 4to, 97.

"Strange composition it is,—strong, masculine style. It may impugn a dignitary of the church to say so, but his style reminds us of Paise.... Nobody would be the better for reading Mandeville, whose theory, being founded on a false and degrading base, has naturally and inswitably fallen into complete noglect.... Ills theory, that the whole of suciety is benefited by the vices of some, is not worth combating; for, if you allow the ill conduct of one man to be advantageous, why not two, or twenty, or twenty thousand? What is to define the bounds of private life to which he would confine his vice? What is sockey, that vague generality, made up of but private lives as masse? The singularity of his book, and what made it read when it appeared, is the homely sort of coarse eloquence which seemed to take plain common sense for his mode, and, building on absurdity, to argue in the most rational manner."—Furfolds of a Man of the World, in Lon. He wrote an account of his travels in Latin; from which he translated it into French, from French to from which he translated it into French, from French to English, and into Italian. It has also been pub. in Spanish, Belgio, and German. The first printed ed, is supposed to have been the Italian one of Pietro de Corasto, Milan, 1430, 4to; the first English ed. was pub, 1493, 8vo; the bast of the old English ed.s. is that of 1725, 8vo. "Mandeville was the Bruce of the fourteenth century,—as often calumniated, and even ridiculed. The most ingenuous of voyagers has been considered as an idle fabulist; the most cautious, as creduous to fatuity; and the volume of a genuine writer, which has been translated into every European language, has been formally rejected from the collection of authemite travels. His truest vindication will be found by comprehending him; and to be acquainted with his character we must seek for him in his own age."

"Sir John Mandeville's probity remains unimpeached; for the accuracy of whatever he relates from his own personal observation has been confirmed by subsequent travellers. The view which Mr Disracti has taken of the character of Sir John Mandeville, our first traveller,—or, rather, the first Englishman who has recorded his journeys,—is very just and accurate."—Lon. "Mandeville has become proverbial for indulging in a traveller's - vanaction as occome provertat or induging in a traveler's exaggeration; yet his accounts of the countries which he visited have been found far more veracious than had been imagined. "Of all these [early] travellers Mandeville is by far the most likely to enjoy permanent reputation, at least with English readers: the position has occupies is honourable throughout both to himself. and to his country and to his country; for he everywhere maintains the character of a gentleman, a gallant soldier and devout but candid Christian, journeying, in upright intention and complete independence, 'whither he listeth,' to gratify his curlosity and thirst for information."—Lon. Addison proceeds to ridicule Sir John's supposed exaggerations and "inventions;" but, as we have seen above, the investigations of later travellers have brought the Voiage and Travaile of Mandeville into better credit than it formerly possessed.

The Reports of Burrow, Cowper, and Donglass contain the substance of Lard Mansfield's Judicial decisions; and they are among the most interesting reports in the English law. . . . We all know that, from his time, the great study has been to find out some certain general principles, which shall be known to all mankind, to rule not only one particular case, but to serve as a guide for the future. Most of us have heard those principles stated, reasoned upon, enlarged, and explained, till we have been lost in admiration at the strength and stretch of human understanding."—Ms. Justice Bullet. We have already referred to Lord Bolingbroke (see p. 215 of this Dictionary) as a not enthusiastic render of Manton's Sermons. His lordship, not satisfied with complaining to Pope, thus addresses Swift on the same distasteful theme :

"I resolve," he writes in 1721, "to make my letter at least as long as one of your sermons; and, if you do not mend, my next shall be as long as one of Dr. Manton's, who taught my youth to yawn, and prepared me to be a High Churchman, that I might nover hear him read nor read him more."

It would have been better for his lordship if he had proved a more patient student of Manton's discourses.

Marcy, E. E., M.D., "universally regarded among the leading Homeopathists of the age, both as practitioner and author, was born in Greenwich, Mass., Dec. 9, 1815. Ile graduated in 1837 at Amherst College, and in 1840 at Jefferson Medical College, Phila. He has written-1. Theory and Practice of Medicine, 630 pages small octavo, pub. 1852, by Radde, New York, of which three editions of 3000 each have been printed. 2. Homosopathy vs. Allopathy, 150 pages small octavo, pub. 1854, by Radde; two editions of 3000 each. He has been editor, since 1852, of the North American Homosopathic Journal, a Quarterly Magazine of Medicine and the Auxiliary Sciences, each No. containing 200 pages octave, now in a most flourishing condition. He edited Hahnemann's Lesser Writings, pub. 1854, by Radde. During the past ten years he has also written numerous essays on medical and chemical subjects; and his works are recognised as standard authorities here and in Europe, where his writings have been translated and extensively republished. He is a very fluent, pleasing writer, with a clear, character and formible girls, and all his writings are precisive. elegant, and forcible style; and all his writings, especially his controversial papers, possess remarkable power, and evince rare learning and a most profound knowledge of medicine, chemistry, and cognate sciences. He has a most genial disposition, great gentleness and urbanity in his social and domestic relations, and no man has a larger circle of valued friends. He is universally esteemed by rich and poor, to the latter of whom he is extremely kind and affable. His consumnate skill as a practitioner is a constant and general theme of culogy among his patients, and may be best known by the fact that he has undeniably the largest, best, and most lucrative practice in the city of New York. How he has contrived to write so much amid the absorbing cares of his profession would be a marvel to those who do not know that he toils on while others sleep. He was formerly an allopathic physician; and when, after a most careful and thorough investigation, he changed his opinions, he verified his theories by extended observation in the first hospitals of Europe. is now in his prime, and bids fair to lead a long life of nsofulness.

For the above notice we are indebted to Mr. W. J. A. Fuller, of New York. We, of course, do not pretend to have any judgment upon such abstruse subjects as the differences between medical schools,—save to have recourse to either mode of practice as seldom as possible. A late clerical acquaintance of ours, who has recently left the world, characterizes Dr. Marcy as

Lord Macaulay remarks,

My account of these transactions [see the text] I have been forced to take from the narrative of the Duchess of Marlborough, a narrative which is to be read with constant suspicion, except when, as is often the case, she relates some instance of her own maignity and insolence."—Hist. of Eng., vol. iv. chap. xviii., n.

We are no admirer of her ladyship, but it strikes us that this comment is hardly becoming the page of the historian. Swift, indeed, tells us that the duchess was the victim of "three furies which reigned in her breast, and and avering diadatable ladded and and and are constituted as sordid avarice, disdainful pride, and ungevernable rage; and Pope does not speak of her in the most respectful terms; but neither Swift nor Pope were in the habit of Marioe, Marlow, or Marlowe, Christopher, 1565?-1593, sducated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, became an actor and a dramatist, led a loose life, and was killed in a quarrel of the most reputable character. A collective ed. of his works, edited by Goorge Robinson, was pub. in 1826, 3 vols. cr. 8vo. The collective ed. of his Works edited by Rev. Alexander Dyce, D.D., 1850, 3 vols. sm. 8vo, contains the following pieces: Vol. I. Account of Marlowe and his Writings; Addenda and Corrigenda; First and Second Parts of Tamburisine; and corrigence; sirst and second raris of authorization,

The Jew of Malta. Vol. II. Faustus, (two texts and ballad;) Edward II.; Massacre at Paris; Dido. Vol. III.

Manwood; Note concerning Marlowo's opinions; Portions of Gager's Dido; Specimens of Petowe's Hero and Leander; The Atheist's Tragedie; Index to the Notes. Dr. Dyce, it will be noticed, does not include Lust's Dominion, often ascribed-probably without reason-to Marlowe; and, on the other hand, great doubt has been expressed whether Marlowe was really the author of Tamburlaine the Great, and co-author with Nash of Dido. Queen of Carthage. Those who are curious in the matter can refer to the authorities indicated below, whilst we proceed to quote some opinions upon a number of the pieces just named. 1. Tamburlaine the Great, Lon., 1590, 8vo.

"Tamburlaine was ridiculed on account of its inflated style.

The bombast, however, which is not so excessive as has been alleged, was thought appropriate to such Oriental tyrants. This play has more spirit and poetry than any which, upon clear grounds, can be shown to have precaded it. We find also more action on the stage, a shorter and more drumate chalogue, a more figurative style, with a far more varied and skilful versification."

"Edward II. is, according to the modern standard of composition, Marlowe's best play. It is written with few oftences against the common rules, and in a succession of smooth and flowing lines. The poet, however, succeeds less in the voluptions and effeninate descriptions which he here attempts than in the more dreadful and violent bursts of passion. Edward II. is drawn with historic truth, but without much dramatic effect."—Hastil's Lets. on the Dramat. Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"The reluctant pungs of abdicating royalty in Edward furnished hints which Shakspeares scarcely improved in his Richard the Second; and the death scene of Marlowe's king moves pity and terror beyond any scene, ancient or modern, with which I am acquainted,"—Charles Lamb's Characters of Dramat. "His Life and Death of Dr. Faustus, though an imperfect and quequal performance, is his greatest work. Faustus himself is a rade sketch, but it is a rigantic one. This character may be considered as a personification of the pride of will and eagerness of curiosity sublimed beyond the reach of fear and remorse."—Healill's Lects, on the Dramat. Age of Elizabeth, Lect. II.

"The growing horror of Faustus's last scene are awfully marked by the hours and half-hours as they expire, and bring him nearer and nearer to the exactment of his dire compact. It is indeed an except safe for a fearful collectation."—Lemb's Characters of Dramat.

Writers Contemp, with Shakspeare.

"It is full of poetical beauties; but an intermixture of buffognery weakens the effect, and leaves it on the whole rather a sketch by a great goalius than a finished performance. There is an awful arekansifiedy about Marlowe's Mephistophetes, perhaps more impressive than the malignant mirth of that find in the renowned sork of Goothe. 5. The Famous Tragedy of the Rich Jew of Masta, 1633, 4to. With Prof. by W. Shone, 1818, 8vg.

"The author seems to have relied on the horror inspired by the subject, and the national disgret excited against the principal charactor, to rouse the feelings of the audience: for the real, it is a tissue of gratuitous, unprovoked, and incredible atrocities, which are committed, one upon the back of the other, by the parties concerned without motive, possion, or object."—Hankit's Lects. on, the Branch. Lit, of the Age of Elisateth, Lect. II.

"Marlowe's Jew does not approach so near to Shakepeare's as the Edward the Second does to Richard the Second. Barabas is a mere monster brought in with a large painted note to please the rabbie. He kills in sport, poisons whole a noneries, lovents infernal machines."—Lambar characters of Dismat, Writers Contens, unith Stakepeare.
"The first two acts of the Jew of Malta are more vigorously with Stakepears.

"The first two acts of the Jew of Malta are more vigorously conceived both as to character and circumstance, than any other Elizabethan play, except those of Shakepears; and perhaps we may think that Barabas, though not the prototype of Shylock,—a praise of which he is unworthy,—may have suggested some few ideas to the inventor. But the latter's acts—as is usual with our old dramations—are a tissue of uninteresting crimes and slaughter.

Marlowe's plays are now but little known to the reader; but a few verses, which were perhaps but lightly esteemed by the author, have preserved his name in the memory of thousands :

"Every one is familiar," says Mr. Hallam, "with the beautiful song of Marlowo. "Come live with me, and be my love," and with the hardly less beautiful answer ascribed to Raleigh."—Lit. Hist. of Pair pe, 4th ed., 1834, il. 126.

"His tragedice manifest traces of a just dramatic conception; but they abound with tessions and uninteresting scenes, or with such extravagancies as proceeded from a want of judgment, and those barburous ideas of the times over which it was the peculiar gift of Shakapeare's genius alone to triumph and to predominate."—Wirten's Hist. of Equ. We such question, on considering the lighter parts of the present volumes, whether he could ever write a good book of ordinary travels. The only descriptions of scenery which he has introduced are of waterfalls: they are poor and tawdry. His descriptions of manners, which in one sense are so much better, are in another worse. Besides being intemperate and capricious, they frequently too much resemble the trifling of a school-hop who cannot help running away from his business to laugh over an idle story or play with a trickey word as a kitten with its tail. "I must say that the good people have treated me with great kindness. Their hospitality is unbounded, and I find nothing cold or stiff in their manners,—at least not more than is observed among ourselves. There may be exceptions; but I think I may say this as a general truth. The thing in England most prejudiced against the United States is the press. Its ignorance of us is shocking; and it is increased by such aleundities as the travellers vanishish, to which stock of absurdities. I am sorry to say, Cantain shocking; and it is increased by such alcurdities as the travellers publish, to which stock of absurdities, I am sorry to say, Captain Marryut is making an abundant addition,"—Letter to Mr. Ketchum, London, July 23, 1839, Boet, 1857, il. 59.

From a number of criticisms before us on Marryat's

general characteristics as a writer we give a few brief

general characteristics as a writer we give a few brief extracts:

"Captain Marryat stands second in morit to no living novelist but Miss Edgeworth. His happy delineations and contrasts of character, and easy play of native fus, redeem a thomsand faults of verboalty, clumsiness, and coarseness. His strong seems and state superiority to affectation of all sorts command respect; and is his quiet effectiveness of circumstantial nurrative be sometimes approaches old Defor."—J. G. Lockhar: Lon. Mag., xxxil. 195.

"Captain Marryat's productions are happy in more senses than one: he employs neither the effort nor the prolixity of Cooper; the conception of character is so facile and felicitous that his personages immediately become our intimete acquaintance, and astonish us by their faithful resemblance to whole chases of beings aimirally situated. Captain Marryat's hemour is genuine: it flows naturally, and insensibly communicates to the reader the galacty the author himself scome authorated with."—Westminster Rev.

Marshall, John, LL.D., September 24, 1755-July 6, 1835, a native of Fauquier county, Virginia, the eldest child of Colonel Thomas Marshall, became a captain in the army of the Revolution, 1777, and took part in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Monmouth; was admitted to the Bar 1780; and, after filling various public offices with great distinction, was in 1801 made Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and retained this important position until his death. It evinces more strength of mund and detail of research than eloquence and interest, but will always remain the first authority for that period of our annals."—Rev. The following critique, ascribed to one of the most eminent of American authors, is taken from the columns of the New York Evening Post:

of the New York Evening Post:

"Marshall's Life of Washington, which is the most voluminous work yet written by an American slave-holder, is no longer read. If it bears any traces of its author's uncommon powers of mind, it is in the depths of dulness which he explored, and the rigor with which he has excluded every feature of interest which might reasonably be looked for in a life of Washington from the pen of one of this most intimate and eminent friends. As one of the earliest biographies of one of the most remarkable of men, Marshall's book may continue to occupy a place upon the shelves of our public libraries until the edition new in print is worn out. If it is ever reprinted, it will not be out of compliment to any permanent literary or historical merit which the work per-

Let us now see in what manner Marshall's Life of Washington was received by English critics. In a few months after the appearance of the last volume, a notice of the work (and of Ramsay's Life of Washington) ap-peared in the Edinburgh Review for October, 1808. peares in the gainburgh Review for October, 1898. We quote the opening paragraph of this paper:

"If we are to regard the history of a good man's life as a monument which literature creeks to his memory, and to consider the magnitude of the intellectual structure as sufficient to insure its celebrity and duration, the chief justice of America must certainly be allowed to have graced the fields of literature with one of the most promising trophles ever employed to commemorate the illustrians deal. But mera bulk, we amanche days no durable smaller. most promising frophies ever employed to commemorate the illustrious dead. But mere bulk, we suspect, gives no durable quality to works made of words; and it is not by the space they cover that they are likely to attract the notice of mankind. Mr. Marshall must not, therefore, promise himself a reputation commensurate with the dimensions of his work; for we are greatly signal that it may come to be superseded, and the name of Washington carried down to posterity by some less ostontations but more tastful and pleasing memorial."—148-149.

Whether this readiation, has been fulfilled or not must

SPARKS, JARED.

The Edinburgh reviewer proceeds-not in the most complimentary tone, certainly—to indicate alleged defects in the work under notice. This critique was one of the offences which called down upon the Edinburgh the wrath of Mr. Robert Walsh, in his well-known Appeal from the Judgments of Great Britain respecting the United States of America, &c., 1819, 8vo. Lord Jeffrey, never indis-posed to take up the cudgels in a literary encounter, reviewed the Appeal in the Edinburgh Review for May,

"We have called Mr. Marshall's book," his lordship remarks,
"dull and honest, accurate and heavy, valuable and tedious, while nether Mr. Walsh, nor anybody else, ever thought or said any thing class of it. It is this style only that we object to."—413; and in Leftrey's Contrib. to the Elin Rev.. 1853, 810.

But Blackwood does not let Judge Marshall's production escape so easily:

tion escape so ensily:

"Washington's Life,—so called, a great heavy book that should have been called by some other name. As a lawyer—as a judge whose decisions, year after year, in the Supreme Court of the United States, would have done credit, honour, to Wostminstor Hall, in the proof season of English law—we must, we do revere Chief-Justice Marshall. But we cannot—will not—forgive such a man for having made such a book about such sucher man as George Washington. Full of power, full of truth, as the work undoubtedly is, one gets thred and sick of the very name of Washington before he gets half through these four [five] prodigious octaves, which are equal to about a dozen of our fashionable quarters; and all this without even finding out by them who Washington was, or what he has done. . . Insupportably thresome: and, with all his honesty, care, and sources of information from the papers of Washington, greatly mistaken several times in matters of importance."—American Writers, Nos. IV., Y., vol. xvil. 57, 187. 57, 187,

When Judge Marshall pub., in 1824, his History of the American Colonics separately, Judge Story remarked, "Many of these words in the "camer edition which were objected to by British critics, in no very kind spirit, as peculiar to America, though they exist in the writings of authors of good repute in their own country, have been sedulously removed from the text. We do not object to this, though we have had occasion to know that some criticisms of this sort have been owing more to the ignorance or petulance of the reviewers than to their secund taste or extensive acquaintance with English literature."—N. Amer. Rev., XXVI. 39.

ignorance or petulance of the reviewers than to their secund taste or extensive acquaintance with English liberature."—N. Amer. Rev., xxvi. 39.

"The life of Washington by Judge Marshall, like the life of Chaucer ty Godwin, is rather a history of the period when he fourished than the real biography of the individual."—Joun Lambur. note to his London ed. of Saimagunet, 1811, i. 126.

"The work [Marshall's Life of Washington] is, indeed, chiefly compiled from Washington's correspondence, and a life of Washington from Washington's correspondence, and a life of Washington is of course a bistory of the American war. To the first volume of this work I have referred you on a former occasion.

The conclusions which you will draw from the pages of Marshall you will find much the same as those that you would derive from Ramsay. The more appropriate value of the work consists in the description of the distresses of Washington. . . It is im, possible for an English student to judge of these transactions connected with the American Revolution) without reading Ramsay's work, or Marshall's Life of Washington."—Prof. Simptit's Lects. XXXIII, XXXIV.

In 1839, 8vo, there was pub. in Boston a selection from the Decisions of Chief-Justice Marshall, (made by Mr. Perkins, of Cincinnati, under the advice of Judge Story,) under the title of The Writings of John Marshall, late Chief-Justice of the United States, upon the Federal Constitutions. 1839, 8vo. stitution, 1839, 8ro.

"His peculiar triumph was in the exposition of constitutional law. It was here that he smod confessedly withrout a rival, whether we regard his thorough knowledge of our civil and political history, his admirable powers of illustration and generalization, bis acrupalous integrity and exactness in interpretation, or his consummate skill in moulding his own genius into its elements, as if they had constituted the exclusive study of his life. His proudest epitaph may be written in a single line,—Here lies the Raymonder of the Constitution of the United States,"—Jupic Story: Character and Struces of Chief-Justice Marshall: Story's Miscell. Writings, 18:2, 688.

"His opinions do not abound in displays of learning. His sumplicity—a character so conspicuous in all his writings and actions—that first and highest characteristic of true greatness—led him to say and do just what was necessary and proper to the purpose in hand. Its reflected consequences on his own fame as a scholar, a statesman, or a jurist seem never once to have occurred to him. As a judge, the Old World may be fairly challenged to produce his superior. His style is a model,—simple and musculine; his reaconing direct, eogent, demonstrative, advancing with a giant's pace and power, and yet withal so easy evidently to him as to show clearly a mind in the constant habit of such efforts."—Judge Sharmoond's Professional Ethics, 1855, 103, q. r.

"Who among them (the ancient Crecks and Romans) dispensed public justice and laid broad and deep the foundations of constitutional law like John Marshall?—Itzv. Albert Barkes: Essays and Reviews, 1855, il. 264. And see pp. 183, 194.

"The character of his mind, its patience, its calmess, its power of analysis and generalization, and the steadiness of its movements, mark him peculiarly fitted for the exposition of constitutional law. Whatever rank may be assigned to him as a common lawyer, in this department he stands confessedly above and without a rival."—Genera R. Hillards: Review of Judge Story's Discourse on Judg have often been described:

"Marshall is of a tall, stender figure, not graceful nor imposing ut erect and steady. His hair is black, his eyes small and winkling, his forchead rather low; but his features are in general narmonious. His manners are plain, yet dignified; and an unaffected modesty diffuses itself through all his actions. His dress is ery simple, yet next; his language chaste, but hardly elegant: it loss not flow rapidly, but it seldom wants precision. He has of the majosty and compactness of thought of Pr. Johnson; but a subtle logic he is no unworthy disciple of Bavid Hume: "Judge lary to S. P. P. Pay, Esq., Washington, Feb. 25, 1808: Story's Life as Letters, 1851, 1, 160-167.

"This work embraces a memoir of every officer in his Majesty's Naval Service, from the senior Flag-Officer down to the junior 'Commander.' It contains much of chronological and ancedetical information. Many of the characters are authentic and ably drawn. The author, however, has fallen into the error common to contemporary biographers: he indulges throughout his work in a laudatory strain, and his praise is frequently fulsome to a fault. The book is said to be, from this very reason, rather unpopular in the profession."—Goodhaph's E. G. Lib. Man., 52.

Respecting the merits of Marston as a dramatic author

we find wide differences of opinion:

"The most scurritons, flithy, and obscene writer of his time."— GIFFORD: his ed. of Ben Jouson's Works. How much of this compliment is to be attributed to Marston's unsparing attacks upon Gifford's prime favourite Jonson we shall not pretend to determine. Certainly, there have been more favourable judgments recorded than that just quoted; for example:

that just quoted; for example:

"He was free from all Observe Presches, which is the chief cause that makes Plays to be so odious unto most Men. He abbor'd such Writers and their Works, and profest himself an Enemy to all out has stufft their Scenes with Ribaldry, and lauded their lines with Scurilious Taunts and Jests. So that whatsoers even in the Spring of his Years his presented upon the private and publick Theatre, in his Auturn and Declining Age he needed not to be ashamed of."—Ep. Ited. to his Pluys, 1633, 12mo.

Langbaine, writing about balf a century later, quotes this compliance with exidence and each man fellow.

this compliment with evident satisfaction, and seems fully to endorse it,—adding,

"An Excellent Character! and fit for the Imitation of our Dramatists; most of whom would be thought to have thoroughly studied Horace: I could wish, therefore, that they which know him as well would call to mind and practice his Advice; which is thus express:

Slivis deducti caveant, me judice, Pauni.

the Biographica Dramstics and, reserving to the com-mendation above noticed, (Ep. Ded. to his Plays,) remarks that "it is little more than might have been gathered from the perusal of his works." It is not to be forgotten, however, that one of Marston's Satyres—Pigmalion's Image—was ordered to be burned on account of its licentiousness. Hazlitt expresses a high opinion of Marston's literary merits:

"Marston is a writer of great merit, who rose to tragedy from the ground of consedy, and whose forle was not sympathy either with the stronger or softer emotions, but an impatient scorn and bitter indigmation against the vires and follies of men, which vented itself either in comin irony or in lofty invective. He was properly a salfrist. He was not a toward to with his contemporaries, nor they with him. He was first on terms of great intimacy, and afterwards at open war, with Ben Jonson; and he is most unfairly criticized in The letturn from Parmassus, under the name of Mondeur Kinsayder, as a mere libeller and buffoon."—Lects, on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth, Lect. 111.

The Rev. Peter Hall also calls Marston

In the Poetaster, also, Marston is satirized by Ben Jonson under the name of Demetrius. See Decker, Jonson under the name of Demetrius. See Decker, Thomas. The London Retrospective Review remarks that, "Although little of real passion is to be found in the plays of Marston, there is a vigour, an apparent earnestness, both in his thoughts and language, which wall supplies the place of the more genuine feelings of nature. He wants that delicacy of perception, that absorption of his own conscionances in the feelings of his character, without which true passion cannot be delineated. He never appears to lose himself sufficiently in the scenes which he deplets: we see too much of Marston, and too little of his heroes. This same proposity has given a courseness to some of his characters, and an indelicacy. Any grossness of expression to his language. and an indelicacy, may grossness, of expression to his kinguage, which is, in our idea, totally irreconcilable with the culorium pronounced by his bookseller. [Ep. Ded. to his Plays, supra].

With strong notions of moral rectitude, he had not the slightest with strong nations of mora rectitude, he had not the sugmest toleration for deviations from them, and no other resource for correcting or reforming them than to apply his satirical lash, and then he was happy,—for in this his power laid, and he felt that it did."—

As a satirist, Marston is thus by Warton compared with

Bishop Hall:

Mishop Hall:

"There is a carelessness and laxity in Marston's versification, but there is a freedom and facility which Hall has too frequently missed by labouring to confine the sonse to the couplet. Hall's meaning, among other reasons, is not always so soon apprehended, on account of his compression both in sentiment and diction. Marston is more perspicuous, as he thinks less and writes hastily. Hall often draws his materials from books and the diligent perusal of other satirists, Marston from real life."

Mr. Hallam thinks that Warton rates Marston at his full value, to say the least.

full value, to say the least:

Warton has compared Marston and Hall, and concludes that "Warron has compared Marston and Hall, and concludes that the latter is more 'elegant, exact, and elaborsto.' More so than his tival he may be possibly esteemed; but these three epithets cannot be predicated of his satire in any but a relative sense."—

Marvel, Ik. See MITCHELL, DONALD G.

Marvell, Andrew, M.P., 1620-1678, a native of Kingston-upon-Hull, Yorkshire, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, was, in 1660, elected to represent his native town in Parliament, and retained this station until his death. He was in Holland and Germany between 1661 and '63, and three months after his return to England again went abroad, for two years, as secretary to Lord Carlisle, Ambassador-Extraordinary to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. In 1657, he was made assistant to Milton, who was Latin Secretary to the Protector, enjoyed the intimate friendship of that distinguished poet, and was one of the first to recognise his gonius:

"When Paradise Lost was published, it was valued but by fare as no more than a lifeless plece, till Mr. Marvell and Dr. Barrow publickly espoused it, each in a judicious Poem."—Cooke's Life if Mercell, 1726.

As a member of Parliament, and as a political satirist, Marvell made himself so formidable to the Government of Charles II. that an effort was unsuccessfully made, through Lord Danby, to give him golden reasons for ad herence to the king and his ministers; but Marvell had provided his dinner for the day, and asked for nothing more. The story is too well known to need repetition here. His works are now little read. The best-known of them are—The Rehearsal Transposed, 1672-73, 2 vols. 12mo, (against Samuel Parker, afterwards Bishop of Oxford;) Historical Essays on General Councils, Creeds, &c., 1674, '80.'87, 4to; 1689, 8vo; An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, 1678, fol. ; Miscellaneous Poems, 1681, fol.; A Second and Third Collection of Poems on Affairs of State, by A. M., L., and other Wits, 1689, 4to. His Works, with his Life prefixed, (a very incomplete ed., containing only his Poems and Letters.) was pub. by Cooks, 1725, 2 vols. 12mo; again, 1772, 2 vols. 12mo. A more complete ed., (containing his Poetical, Controversial, and Political Works, with many Original Letters, Poems, and Tracts, never before printed,) with a new Life of the Author, was pub: by Captain Edward Thompson, 1776, 3 vols. 4to. Even this ed. omits a defence of the celebrated divine, John Howe, whose tract on the Divine Prescience had been attacked by tract on the Divine Prescience had been attacked by three antagonists. Thompson also includes some pieces which are the property of other authors. A Life of Andrew Marrell, the Celebrated Patriot, with Extracts and Selections from his Prose and Poetical Works, was pub. by John Dove, Lon., 1832, 12mo. This vol. receives but little praise from Mr. Henry Rogers, in his review of the Works of Marvell, in the Edin. Review, xcil., 70, (reprinted in Rogers's Essays, i. 48.) The Rehearsal Transposed was greatly praised by the wits of the age, and certainly has this merit, that it effectually silenced Parker.

certainly has this merit, that it electually should all acceptable burnet says of the latter that,

"After he had for some years entertained the nation with several virulent books, he was attacked by the diveliest droll of the age, who wrote in a burleague strain, but with so peculiar and entertaining a conduct, that, from the king down to the trademan, his books were read with great pleasure, and not only humbled Parker, but the whole party; for the author of the 'Rehearsai Transposed' had all the men of wit on his side."

"that it was generally thought, by many of those who were otherwise favourers of Parker's cause, that the victory lay on Marsell's side. . . It wrought thus good effect on Parker, that, forever after, it took down his high spirit."

Dean Swift, after referring to the oblivion which usually engulfs controversial publications, adds,

There is, indeed, an exception when any great genius thinks it worth his while to expose a foolish piece: so we still read Marvell's answer to Parker with pleasure, though the book it answers be sunk long ago.

The critic of the Retrospective Review thinks that the prose works of Marvell, ilike the prose works of Milton, will attract the attention which, as part of the standard literature and history of our country, they so justly merit; and that day is not very far distant. —1824, xi.

as part of the standard literature and history of our country, they so justly merit; and that day is not very far dustant. '-1824, xi. 174-195.

As regards his poetry, the same critic remarks,

"All the poems, however, contain more or less of pootse beauty: some, great tenderness of feeling and expression; and others, successful descriptions of nature and pustoral scenes.''--lhd., p. 174.

"As a poet." says Mass Mittord. 'he is little known, except to the professed and unweatied reader of old folios. And yet his poems possess many of the finest elements of popularity: a rich profusion of fancy, which almost dazzles the mind as bright colours dazzles the eye; an can nestness and heat these which do not always—do not often—belong to these flowery fancies, but which when found in their company, add to them inexpressible vitality and savour; and a frequent felicity of phrase, which, when once read, fives itself in the memory and well not be forgotten. Mixed with these dazzling qualities is much carelessness, and a prodigality of conceits which the stern Roundhead ought to have left, with other frippery, to his old connect the Cavaliers. But it was the vice of the age: all ages have then twounte literary sine; and we must not blame Marvell too severely for falling into an error to which the very exuberance of his nature rendered him peculiarly prope. His mind was a bright garden, such a garden as he has described in fine and the second of the second of illortua.]"—Lon. Retroy. Rev., 1825, xi. 182-185.

There is a wide difference of opinion as regards Marvell's merits as a satirist. Disraeli says that "he was a muster in all the arts of ridicule: and his inexhaustible splicit only required some permanent subject to have rivalled the chausticity of Swift, whose style. In neatness and vivacity, seems to have been modelled on his. But Marvell placed the oblation of genius on a temporary atlas, and the sacrifice sunk with it: he wrote to the times, and with the times his writings have passed away; yet something there is incorruptible in wit, and wherever its sait has fallen that part is still preserved."—Quarrels of Authors, in Macell, of Ld., ed. 1840, 238, q. r.

Mr. Hallam gives a far less favourable verdict:

"We read with nothing but disguet the sattical poetry of Cleveland, Butter, Oldham, and Marvell, or even of men whose high rank did not soften their style,—Rochester, Dorset. Mulgrave. In Dryden there was, for the first time, a poignancy of wit which made them more cutting... Marvell wrote sometimes with more taste and feeling than was usual: but his satires are gross and stuppd."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1884, iii. 484, 489.

Mason, William, 1725-1797, an English divine who gained some reputation by his poetry, but more by the friendship of Gray, was the son of the Vicar of St. Trinity Hall, in the East Riding of Yorkshire; educated Trinity Hall, in the East Riding of Yorkshire; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and elected a Follow of Pembroke College in 1747. In 1754, he took holy orders; became Rector of Aston, Yorkshire, and chaplain to the king, and at the time of his death had been thirty-two years Precenter and Canon Residentiary of York. His principal works are Elfrida, a Dramatic Poem, written on the Model of the Antient Greek Tragedy, 1752, 4to; Odes on Memory, Independence, Melancholy, and the Fate of Tyranny, 1756, 4to; Caractucus, a Dramatic Poem, written on the Model of the Antient Grock Tragedy, 1759, 4to; The English Garden, a Poem in Four Books, 1772-82, 4to; Collection of Anthems for Church Music, 1782; Secular Ode in Commemoration of the Glorious Revolution, 1686, 4to, 1788; Essays, Historical and Critical, on English Church Music, 1795, 12mo. The Plays of Elifrida and Caractacus, with a Monody on the Death of Mr. Pope, Odes, Elegies and Latters, were pub. in 1805, 8vo; and a collective ed. of his Works in 1811, 4 vols. 8vo; again, 1816, 4 vols. 8vo. From a review in the London Quarterly Review (xv. 376-287) of the literary characteristics of Mason, we quote a few comments:

"The literature of Mason has been underrated. [SeeGrar. Thomas, No. 8.] This mistake is partly owing to the absence of all parade of learning in his works, and partly, perhaps, to the gigantic crudition of the friends; but his attainments as a scholar might be far beneath those of Hurd and Gray, and, at the same time, far above those of ordinary classical scholars. He was bred, indeed, at a country school, and therefore never tried to emulate the forms of classical composition; but his taste was good, his knowledge of the learned languages not defective, and he was certainly able, without a master, to transfer 'the choral graces of Sophocles' into his own dramatic compositions. That he failed in his attempt to transplant these graces to the English stage was no imputation on the learned languages not defective, and he was certainly able, without a master, to transfer 'the choral graces of Sophoeles' into his own dramatic compositions. That he failed in his attempt to transplant these graces to the English stage was no Imputation on his knowledge or his talents: they were copied with skill and with animation, but the genius—we may be permitted to say, the better genius—of our own drama presented an inauperable bar. Mason only failed where Milton had failed before. From the first specimens which are preserved of his Muse, he appears to have been gifted by nature with the materials of a great poet: his faults were those of superfittly, not of defect; his imagination was copious to excess, his diction florid even to the conflues of bombust. On the Caractacus and Kifrida it would be idle to comment. The public taste has at length assigned to them the rank of beautiful dramatic poems, with much inney, some timel, great classical taste, and an entire unitness for representation. In elegies and moral epistless Mason was excellent: the flow of his versification, the warmth but honest independence of his ophions. Into one of intellectual superiority which he maintains in addressing the great, the exalted scattiments of morality and religion which he generally infuses into these short but exquisite compositions, render it difficult to determine whether we are more to respect the poot or the man.

"But in the more cramped and contracted walk of somet and metrical epitaph, Mason reigns and triumpls. In the former he sometimes for surpasses Milton; in the latter he rivals Dryden."—350, 331–322, 343–344.

After contributing a number of poetical compositions to a prominent newspaper, he mustered sufficient courngs to publish a collection of his pieces in a shilling volume. "Perhaps no poet of the present day has a more exuberant fancy than Mr. Massey; but he rarely shows any higher power than fancy. The majority of his poems are like children's May-garlands,—bright with flowers which have no root and are only artificially woven into close contact... We are perpetually wearred with a series of lines each of which is a fresh tax on our ingenuity in detecting fantastic analogy... His versification, often highly unsical through a felicity of genius, is often utterly bad through an indifference apparently due cither to an excessive self-entimate or to a want of artistic scrupilousness."—Westminster Review, lan. 1857, q. v.

"Robert Burna," remarks Alexander Smith, in a lectura on the Poorer Powts of England,—the list would have been too large had it been the Poor Powts of England,—thought Scatchinen that poverty and hard work are unable to stifle genius: Massey has taught the same less in to Englishmen. The future career of one who has drawn beauty from poverty and strength from privation is one on which all men must look with infecest, and some, perhaps, with a little anxiety. That it will be a brilliant one we have little doubt. He is yet young, and may reasslably expect a long life. His power is in lyric postry: of this he seems to be aware; and he is not therefore, likely to wante his best years in walks of art toreign to his nature and genius. We hope that when he dies he will leave many songs behind hur in the hearts of the people of England,—wongs which will assest them in the work of the day, and help to make the right beautiful."

"The public are much better acquainted with the writings of Massinger than with those of most of his contemporaries; for which distinction he is mainly indebted to the admirable manner in which has been edited by Mr. Gifford, and to the circumstance of some of his Plays having been illustrated on the Stage by the talents of a popular actor."—Medical Lett. We proceed to quote some opinions upon a number of the plays of the author under consideration:

THE VIRGIN MARTYR:

THE VIRGIN MARTYR:

"Read the first four acts of Massinger's 'Virgin Martyr,' and Offford's very agreeably-written 'Introduction.' The morits of the poot are certainly great, though, as usual, rather exaggerated by the editor. The style is most elegant, and, as has often been observed, modern to a miracle. There is great moral grandeur in the conception of the principal character, but no probability, no decorum, a grossness so rank as to be perfectly disgusting."—Bis James, Mackinyosh: Life, i. chap. vii.

"This play has some beauties of so very high an order that, with all my respect for Massinger, I do not think he had poetical enthusiasm capable of rising up to them. His associate Decker, who wrote Old Fortunatus, had poetry enough for any thing. The very impurities which intrude themselves among the sweet pleties of this play, like Satun among the Sons of Heaven, have a strength of contrast, a ruciness, and a glow in them, which are beyond Massinger. They are to the religion of the rest what Caliban *s to Miranda."—Charles Lans: Characters of Dramacic Wrv'ers: Works, vol. ii.

"The 'Virgin Martyr' is nothing but a tissue of instantaneous conversions to and from Paganism and Christianity. The only scenes of any real beauty and tenderness in this play are those between Dorothea and Angelo, her supposed friendless beggar-boy, but her guardian-angel in disguise, which are supposed to be by Decker."—Huzlit's Lects, on the Dramat. Let. of the Age of Elizabith Local IV

Decker,"—Hustil's Lects, on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Extendent, Lect. IV.

"In the Virgin Martyr he has followed the Spanish model of 1 ligious autos with many graces of language and a beautiful display of Christian heroism in Dorothea; but the tragedy is in many respects unpleasing."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. 1854, is 110.

THE UNNATURAL COMBAT:

"We read with the strongest feelings of admiration, horror, and disgust, Massinger's Tragedy of the 'Unnatural Combat.' It is "We read with the strongest reelings of admiration. horror, and disgust, Massinger's Tragedy of the 'Unnatural Combat.' It is surprising that a poet of so much taste and judgment in his style should have none in his story, characters, or manners. But it was with Massinger's tasto as with Shakspeare's genius, which is displayed with such producal magnificence in the parts but never employed in the construction of the whole. No Englishman, after this play, ought ever to speak of the horrors of the German stage.

. The union of the grandest moral purity with the rankness of the stows and with more than Germanic horrors (as in the 'Unnatural Combat') is a most extraordinary phenomenon."—Sir James Mukintons: Life ii. chap. vii., viii.

"In the Unnatural Combat—probably among the earliest of Massinger's works—we find a greater energy, a bolder strain of figurative poetry, more command of terror, and perhaps of pity, than in any other of his dramas. But the dark shadows of crime and misery which over-pread this tragedy belong to rather an earlier period of the English stage than that of Massinger, and were not congenial to his temper."—Hullan's Lit. Hist. of Europe, iii. 119.

"The battle batteen the Father and the Son, in the 'Unnatural Combat,' and the dreadful parley which precedes it, are as powerfully expressed as they are imagined. Indeed, the gonius of Massinger is, perhaps, more conspicuous in this Play, with all its faults, than in any other,"—Nocle's Lects. on Eng. Phetry, Loct. IV., 132.

The Dicke of Milar: The Flat Down:

"Among the tragedies of Massinger I should incline to prefer the Duko of Milan. The plot borrows enough from history to give it dignity, and to counterbalance in some measure the predominance of the passion of love which the invented purts of the drama exhibit. The characters of Storza, Marcelia, and Francesco are in Massinger's best manner: the story is skilfully and not improbably developed; the pathos is deeper than we generally find in his writings; the elequence of language, especially in the celebrated speech of Storza before the Emperor, has never been surpassed by him. Many, however, place the Fatal Downy still higher. This tragedy furnished Rows with the story of his Fair Penitent. The superiority of the original, except in suitableness for representation, has long been acknowledged."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 5th ed., 1854. iii, 118.

"The most poetical of Massinger's productions."—Haziti's Lects. on the Dramat. Lit. of the Age of Elizabeth. Lect. TV., q. v.

THE PICTURE; THE BORDMAN; A VERY WOMAN; A NEW WAY TO PAY OLD DEBTS; THE CITY MADAM:

"The interest of The Bondman turns upon two different acts of penance and self-denial in the persons of the hero and heroline, Pissinder and Cleora."—Haziti's Lecta, de.

"The Picture. The Bondman, and A Very Woman may be reckoned among the best of the tragi-conedies of Massinger, But the general merits as well as defects of this writer are perceptible in all; and the difference between these and the rest is not such as to be apparent to every reader. Two others are distinguished as more English than the rest; the scene lies at home and in the age; and to these the common voice has assigned a superiority. They are A New Way to Pay Old Debts, and The City Madam. A character drawa, as it appears, from reality, and, though dar matic art, [conception of character,]"—Hallam's Lil. Hist of Berope, iii. 116, 119.

"Sir Glies Overreach is the most successful and striking effort of Mussinger's pen, and the best-known to the reader; but it will hardly be thought to form an exception to the tenor of the above remarks."—Hallit's Lects., de., q.v.

THE OLD LAW:

"There is an exquisiteness of moral sensibility, making one's eyes to gush out tears of delight, and a poetical strangeness, in the circumstances of this sweet tragicomedy, which are unlike any thing in the dramas which Massinger wrote alone. The pathos is of a subtler edge. Middleton and Rowley, who assisted in it, had both of them finer geniuses than their associate."—Lumb's Characters of Dramat. Writers.

We conclude with some opinions on the general characteristics of Massinger's genius:

"Massinger is distinguished for the harmony and dignity of his dramatic eloquence. Many of his plots, it is true, are liable to heavy exceptions... In a general view, nevertheless, Massinger has more art and judgment in the serious drama than any of the other successors of Shakspeare. His incidents are less entangled than those of Fletcher, and the scene of his action is more clearly thrown open for the free evolution of character. Fletcher strikes the imagination with more vivacity but more irragularity, and, amildst embarrassing positions of his own choosing Massinger puts forth his strength more collectively. ... If the velocomut passions were not Massinger's happiest element, he expresses fixed principle with an art of authority. To make us feel the elevation of human pride was the master-key which he knew how to touch in human sympathy; and his skill in it must have been derived from deep experience in his own bosons."—(tamphell's Specimens of English Poetry. See also Blackw. Mag., v. 223.

"Massinger excelled in working up a single passion forcibly and effectively, rather than un managing his plots skilfully or in delineating characters faithfully and naturally. His catastrophes are sometimes brought about in a very improbable and unnatural manner. . With all these drawbacks, the genus of Massinger is unquestionably great. The sweetness and put ity of his style were not surpassed even in his own days. His choice and management of imagery are generally very happy; excepting that he is apt to pursue a favourite idea too long. ... I cannot quite agree with Mr. Offford when he ranks this author immediately after Shakspeare,"—Neele's Lets, on English Poetry, Lett. IV. 131, 132.

"Massinger as a fragic writer appears to me second only to Shakspeare; in the higher concely I can hardly think him inferior to Jonson. In wit and sprightly dialogue, as well as in knowledge of theatrical effect, he falls very much below Fletcher. The

"Massinger as a tragic writer appears to me second only to Shakspeare; in the higher consequel can hardly think him inferior to Jonson. In wit and sprughtly dialogue, as well as in knowledge of theatrical effect. he falls very much helow Fletcher. These, however, are the great names of the English stage. . . Next to the grace and dignity of sentiment in Mussinger, we must pulse those qualities in his style. Every modern crute has been struck by the peculiar beauty of his language. In his harmoniques swell of numbers, in his pure and genume adion, which a text—by good fortune and the diligence of its last editor (lafford)—far less corrupt than that of Fletcher enables us to enjoy, we find an unceasing charm. The pectical talents of Massingor were very considerable, his taste superior to that of his contemporaries: the colouring of his intagey is rurely overcharged; a certain redundancy, as some may account it, gives fulness, or what the painters call impasto, to his style, and, if it might not always conduce to effect on the stage, is, on the whole, suitable to the character of his composition. The comic powers of this writer are not on a level with the serious; with some degree of humorous conception, he is too apt to aim at exciting ridicule by caricature; and his dialogue wants ultogether;
the sparkling wit of Shakspeare and Fletcher."—Hallan's Lit.
Hist. of Europe, iii, 117-118, 119-120. See also 115, 116, 511

"There can be no doubt that Massinger admirted and studied Shakspeare. In the hasto of composition bis mind turned up many thoughts and phrases of the eider writer, in a more or less perfect state of preservation; but he was neither a plagiarist nor an imitator. His style, conduct, characterisation, and instruct a prefeetly distinct. No serious dramaties of the age owed Shakspeare and versification of which we have, in dramatic poetry at least, no corresponding example. There is a transparency and per spicuity in the texture of his composition, a sweetness, harmony, and ductility, together with a blended strength and each in the structure of his metre, which, in his best performances, delight and never satiate the ear."—Drake: Shakspears and his Timez, it 561-562, q.v. "Ford," says Dr. Drake, "possesses nothing of the energy and majesty of Massinger," (supra, it. 563;) Gifford, too, remarks that Ford has not "the majestic march which distinguishes the poetry of Massinger," (Prof. to Massinger's Plays;) Lord Jeffrey, also, declares that Ford "has not much of the oratorical stateliness that Ford "has not much of the oratorical statellness and imposing flow of Massinger," (Contrib. to Edin. Rev., 1853, 384;) but Coloridge (S. T.) has this strange criticism, which it is difficult to reconcile with the three

eminent authorities just quoted:

"The styles of Massinger's plays and the Samson Agonistes are the two extreaces of the are within which the diction of dramatic poetry may oscillate. Shakspears in his great plays is the midpelnt. In the Samson Agonistes, colloquial language is left at the greatest distance, yet something of it is preserved, to render the dialogue probable; in Massinger the style is differenced in the smallest degree possible, from animated conversation, by the vern of poetry."—Table-Table, ii. 121.

"It must be confessed," says Dr. Ferriar, in his Essay on the Writings of Massinger, "that in comedy he falls considerably beneath Shakspeare; his wit is less brilliant, and his ridicule less delicate and various; but he affords a specimen of olegant consedy (The treat Duke of Florence) of which there is no archetype in his great predecessor. In tragedy Massinger is rather eloquent than pathetic; yet he is often as majestic, and generally more elegant, than his master; he is as powerful a ruler of the understanding as Shakspeare is of the passions; with the disadvantage of succeeding that matchless poet, there is still more original beauty in his work; and the most extensive acquaintance with poetry will hardly diminish the pleasure of a reader and admirer of Massinger."

The critics next to be quoted are not such ardent admirers of Mussinger as some of the authorities already cited profess to be:

"The fame of Massinger has been lately revived by an edition of his works, [diffied's.] Some literary men wish to rank him above Beaumont and Fletcher, as if he had approached more closely to the excellence of Shakepearo. I cannot see it. He appears to me to lear the greatest resemblance to Beaumont and Fletcher in the plan of the pleces, in the tone of manners, and even in the language and negligence of versification. I would not undertake to decide, from internal symptoms, whether a play belonged to Massinger or Boammont and Fletcher."—Schliege? Exets, on Dramat. Art. and Let., Lect. XVII., Black's trans, 1846. 474.

"Massinger makes an impression of hardness and repulsiveness of manner. of manner. In the intellectual processes which he delights to describe, 'reason panders will:' he fixes arbitrarily on some object which there is no motive to pursue, or every motive combined against it, and then, by screwing up his heroes or beroires to the deliberate and blind accomplishment of this, thinks to arrive at the rice pathos and subline of human life.' This is not the way. He salom touches the heart or kindles the fance, it is in vain to hope to exeite much aympathy with convulsive efforts of the will or intricate contrivences of the understanding to obtain that which is better left alone, and where the interest arises principally from the conflict between the absundity of the passion and the obstimecy with which it is persisted in. For the most part, his villatus are a sort of lusia nature; his impassioned characters are like drunkards or madmen. Their conduct is extreme and outrageous, their motives unaccountable and weak: their misfortunes are without necessity, and their crimes without temptation, to ordinary apprehensions. I do not say that this is invariably the case in all Massinger's scenes; but I think it will be found that a principle of playing at cross-purposes is the ruling passion throughout most of them."—Haziti's Lects. on the Dram. Mather, Cettons, D.D., 1863—1728, son of Dr. Increase Mather, and grandson of the celebrated John Cotton, was a native of Boston, Massachusette, graduated at 1848

Harvard College in 1678, and was ordained minister of the North Church, Boston, as colleague with his father, May 13, 1684. He was remarkable for his profound learning, unwearied industry, and sealous promotion of the public interests, both religious and secular. We commend deliberately; for we do not think it just that his unfortunate agency in the "Witchcraft Delusion" (as it is generally termed) should be permitted to counterbalance the piety and philanthropy of his otherwise exemplary and most useful life. Moreover, we have no more doubt that Cotton Mather thought he was doing God service by witch-hunting than we entertain of the purity of his motives in the pulpit-instructions and pastoral visitations for which he was so famous. Mather did not confine his efforts to oral exhortations: few men have used the pen and the press so liberally : his son (Life of Cotton Mather) gives a list of three hundred and eighty-two of his father's publications; and it is known that this list is by no means complete. Almost as much matter as has been published is still in MS., and but little of it, in all probability, will ever see the light. We hope, however, that the Biblia Americana, or The Sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament Illustrated, (now in the library of the Mussachusetts Historical Society,) will yet find a publisher in the "Athens of America." We cannot, indeed, think of any bibliopole in that seat of learning likely to venture upon so unpromising an enterprise,—unless it be our antiquarian friend Samuel G. Drake; and the likelihood of his undertaking this trifling matter may be judged of from the following extract from his own Life of Mather, prefixed to the last ed. of the Magnalia:

"Of the 'Biblia Americana' the doctor's son remarks, 'That is a work the writing of which is enough constantly to employ a man, unless he be a miracle of diligence, the half of the threescore years and ten, the sum of years allotted to us.'"—xxxvi.

If it took so long to write it, what time would Ouere: it take, and how much money would it cost, to print it?

And how many copies would Boston and other Atlantic cities subscribe for? We fear that zealous theological students will still have to depend upon the MS. in their Biblical explorations. If printed, the work would be a fit companion to worthy Joseph Caryl's hydra-beaded Exposition of Job, (see p. 352 of this Dictionary.)

Mather's publications were almost all single sermons, controversial letters, and tracts of a theological complexion. The best-known of his works are the following: 1. Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft and Possessions, Lon., 1689, 8vo; 2d ed., 1691, 12mo; Edin., 1697, 12mo. 2. The Wonders of the Invisible World: being an Account of the Trials of Several Witches lately executed in New England, and of Several Remarkable Curiosities therein Occurring, &c., Lon., 1693, 4to. The worthy Higginson honestly acknowledges that he, had not read the whole of the Magnalia: this was an test Mr. Tudor's claim to be the last thorough render of the Magnalia. Let it not be supposed, however, that Mr. Tudor considered his labour entirely thrown a way:

"This book," he tells us, "is worth consulting by those who wish to become acquainted with the character of our forefathers. Many of the author's faults were those of his age: and, if he has not left us the best, he has at least furnished the largest, work appertaining to our early history. . . . To those who are interested in the early history of our country, it may be well to remark that, for accuracy in historical occurrences, they will do well to rely upon other authorities; but, if they wish to obtain a general view of the state of society and manners, they will probably nowhere find so many materials for this purpose as in the work of this credulous, pedautick, and garralous writer."—Us supra, 257, 272.

Dr. Robbios has a higher oninion of Mather's historical

Dr. Robbins has a higher opinion of Mather's historical accuracy than is expressed by Mr. Tudor:

accuracy than is expressed by Mr. Tudor:

"The work now presented to the American public contains the history of the Fathers of New England, for about eighty years, in the most authentic form. No man since Dr. Mather's time has had so good an opportunity as ho enjoyed to consult the most authentic documents. The greater part of his facts could be attested by living witnesses and the shortest tradition, or taken from written testimonies, many of which have since perished. The situation and character of the author afforded him the most favourable opportunities to obtain the documents necessary for his under taking; and, no historian could pursue a similar design with greater industry and zeal. . . The work is both a civil and an ecclosiastical history. The large portion of it devoted to Biography affords the reader a more distinct view of the leading characters of the times than could have been given in any other form,"—Prof. to ed. of 1820.

"It is chiefly a collection of what the author had before printed on historical and biographical subjects. The value of its contents has been variously estimated,—some decrying it below any value, while others pronounce it 'the only classic ever written in America.' At the hazard of incurring the charge of stupidity, it is the decided opinion of the writer that it has a value between these two extremes."—S. O. Baxke: Monoir of 'oldon Mether, xxxvi.

We have expressed a highly-favourable character of Cotton Mather; and it would not be difficult to quote commendations quite as warm from both ancient and modern authorities. The New England Weekly Journal, in an-nouncing his decease a few days after the occurrence, remarks that "His printed works will not convey to posterity nor give to strangers a just idea of the real worth and great learning of the man."—Da Corners: Faneral Serm, on Cotton Mather.

As regards Mather's learning, Dr. Chauncoy, a contemporary, declared that there were "hardly any books in existence with which Cottou Mather was not acquainted," and that he was "the greatest redeemer of time he ever knew.'

The last remark will remind the reader of the inscription which Mather placed over his library-door: "BE SHORT." We wish that we had courage enough to place it over ours. Mr. Peabody's Life of Cotton Mather, in Sparks's Amer. Biog., First Series, vi. 161-350, has been warmly commended by an eminent authority:

"Mr. Peabody has clearly used the utmost industry in bringing togother all existing information pertaining to his subject. He has woven from these scattered materiats an exceedingly graceful and lively narration."—J. G. PALPIETT. N. Amer. Rev., xiiii, 519.

Perhaps we need hardly add that Dr. Douglas, and some other judges, by no mouns concur in the favourable verdicts already cited respecting the character of Cotton Mather; and among the dissentients may be mentioned our learned and esteemed friend Mr. Bancroft, who in his History of the United States (iii. 97-99) handles the author of Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft in a "memorable" manner. Mather, Increase, D.D., 1639-1723, a native of Dorchester, Muss., the son of Richard Mather, graduated at Harvard College in 1656, began to preach in 1657, and in the North Church, Boston, in 1661, and was ordained there May 27, 1664; President of Harvard College, 1685-1791 1701. He was a man of learning, piety, and indefatigable industry. Few men have been so long in the ministry, sixty-six years, sixty-two of which were passed in one place. His son Cotton (in his Parentator: Memoirs of Remarkable Places in the Life and the Death of the Ever-Memorable Dr. Increase Mather, Bost., 1724, 8vo) gives us a list of eightyfive of his father's publications, (principally sermons,) to which are to be added seven more works, and many pre-faces to other people's books. Among his works are—1. The Mystery of Israel's Salvation Explained and Applied, Lon., 1669, 8vo. "This is full of learning, and contains frequent references to other authors confirming Mather's views."—Lounder's Bril. Lib., Providences, &c., Bost., 1684; new ed., under the title of Remarkable Providences Illustrative of the Earlier Days of American Colonization; with Introduc. Pref. by George Offor, Lon., 1856, 12mo. (In J. Russell Smith's Library of Old Authors.) In this book we have a singular collection of remarkable sca-deliverances, accidents, un-collection of remarkanie sca-centverances, accuments, un-accountable phenomena, witcheraft, apparitions, &c.

"Increase Mather's work is well worth preserving, and its present publication is timely. It is pleasant to see that the per-formances which are now attributed to spirits' rappings, tippings, trances, second-sight, and the like, were well known to the grave fathers of New England, and that Dr. Gordon's theory of the devil at work in these occurrences was defended so ably by a President of Harvard College. We regard this book as a capital contri-bation to spiritualistic literature, in its collection of 'test enses,' its accurate collection of marvels, and, its delightful credulity." N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1857, 554.

Mathias, Thomas James, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1776, Treasurer of the Household to Queen Charlotte, d. 1835, at Naples, where he had resided for many years, is best known as the supposed author of an anonymous poem entitled The Pursuits of Literature, Part 1, 1794; subsequently completed in four Parts, 1794-97, in 1 vol. 8vo; 4th ed., 1808, 8vo; 16th ed., 1812, imp. 4to, large paper for illustration. Messrs. Willis and Sotheran advertise an illustrated copy of the ed. of 1799, inlaid, in imp. fol., 2 vols.; upwards of 200 portraits, £10 10s. See W. and S.'s entalogue, Oct. 25, 1856, 412. The value of this work consists in the satirical notes, which excited great attention and no little indignation. George Steevens said that the poem was merely a peg to hang the notes on. It is known that Mrs. Rochfort claimed the authorship of The Pursuits of Literature for her brother, Dr. Burgh, of York: see Lon. Athen., 1835, 717. Mathins's edit, of the Works of Gray has been already noticed by us; see pp. 726, 729 of this Dictionary. Mathias's fame chiefly rested upon his intimate acquaintance with the

In the Appendix to this vol. will be found an English trans. of the Edict of Nantes. Maury, F. Treat. on the Dental Art, 1843. 8vo. Maury, Matthew Fontaine, LL.D., Licut. U. S. Navy, and Superintendent of the National Observatory at Washington, was born in Spottsylvania county, Vir-ginia, Jan. 14, 1806, and entered the navy in 1825 as a midshipman. Zealously devoting his leisure hours to midshipman. intense study, he soon acquired an intimate knowledge of the branches connected with his profession, and, before receiving promotion, wrote and published (about 1835) his Treatise on Navigation, which afterwards became the text-book for the navy. A third ed. of this excellent work was recently put to press. See South. Lit. Mess., ii. 454. Lieut. Maury's Abstract Log was pub. in 1843, 4to. In 1839, having by an accident been rendered incapable of active service, he became lavourably known a popular writer of essays upon many of the most interesting subjects of the day a such as Navai Reform, with the quaint caption of Scraps from the Lucky Bag; National Defences; Suppression of the African Slave-Traffe; Right of Search; The Guif Stream; The Packet-Ships of New York; The Warehousing System; Southern Cummerce; Overland Communication with the Pacific; The Swamp Lands of the Mississippi, and their Reclamation, Many of his plans and suggestions have been sugrafted upon the policy of the country. The Legislature of Illi-nois entered his papers on the Lake Country in their journal, and passed him a vote of thanks.

He published a pamphlet on The Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America, and induced the Gavernment to send out expeditions to explore that river-basin. Herndon's Exploration of the Amazon, as well as that of the Rio de la Plata, were the fruits of that sug-

Having been placed at the head of the National Observatory at Washington as soon as it was creeted, he proceeded to organize it, and succeeded so completely that with the first volume of observations the character of the American Observatory was raised at once, in the opinion of the lending astronomers of Europe, to a rank equal to that of any establishment of the kind in the world.

The Observatory being in successful operation, Lieut. Maury next turned his attention to the Hydrographical Department of his office, and produced his colebrated Wind and Current Charts, with his book of "Sailing Directions" which necompanies them.

This is the great work of the age in its bearings on commerce and navigation. The Government, appreciating the importance of it, invited the maritime nations of Europe to send delegates to meet Lieut. Maury in conference with the view of discussing the details of a plan for perfecting this work. This incoting took place at Brussels, in August, 1853, and resulted in the adoption of a uniform plan of observations at sea, and in having the co-operation of the principal maritime nations in carrying it out.

"I beg you," says Baron Humboldt, " to express to filent, Maury, the author of the beautiful charts of the winds and currents, preparet with so much care and protound learning, my hearty grat-tude and esteem. It is a great undertaking, equally important to the practical navigator and tor the advance of meteorology in

The important services referred to by the periodical from which we have just quoted have been cerdially acknowledged by foreign countries: we have lying before us a copy of a letter to Maury (Berlin, Feb. 371855) form.

Maury would furnish his portrait to be included in the Gallery of One Hundred Distinguished Men of Science shortly to be published by an Austrian com-mission established for that purpose. Nor should we omit noticing in this record of well-earned honours the gold medal sent by the King of the Netherlands to Lieut. Maury, with the inscription-

Among Maury's contributions to scientific literature we must not omit to mention particularly the following papers: On The Gulf Stream and Currents of the Sea, in Amer. Mess., xiv. 4, xv. 301; On Naval Reform and a Naval School; On the Defences of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the Lakes; On the Amazon and the Atlantic Slopes of South America. These papers attracted wide-spread attention: they were translated and republished in Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, Venezuela, New Grenada, Ecuador, and the Argentine Confederation.

'His parts of nature and art were very good, as appears by his translation of Lucan, (none of the easlest work of that kind.) and more by his Supplement to Lucan, which, being entirely his own for the learning, the wit, and the language, may be well looked upon as one of the best epic poems in the English language. He writ some other commendable pieces of the reign of some of our kings."—Earl of Clarkender. See Nos. 5, 6, 9.

"He was an elegant poet, and translated Lucan into English, Now, though Scaliger was pleased to say hypocritically of Lucan, non canit, sed latrat? yet others (under the roso) as judiciously allow him an excellent poet, and losing no lastre by Mr. May's translation."—Fuller's Warthies, ed. 1840, iii. 259.

"May is certainly a sonorous dactylist, and was sufficiently accomplished in poetical declamation for the continuation of Lucan's Pharsalla. But May's scarcely an author in point. His skill is in partyl; and he was confined to the peruliarities of an Farchetype which, it may be presumed, he thought excellent."—Millon's Parma, by Warther. Pref. p. xv., ed. 1744.

"The first Latin poetry which England can raunt is May's Supplement to Lucan. in seven books, which carry down the history of Pharsalia to the death of Cesan. Concludes with an account of the first battle of Newbury in 1643. With a continuation to the death of Charles I., in Latin, under the title of Historiæ Parliamenti Angliæ Breviarum, 1650, 12mo. May atterwards made an abstract of this History, and a translation, entitled A Broviary of the History of the Parliament of England, 1650, Svo; 1680, 12mo. A new ed, of May's History of the Parliament, edited by Baron Mascres, with a Preface, &c., was pub. in 1812, 4to; and another od, was pub. in 1853. Respecting the merits of this work-which is really rather a History of the Civil War than of the Long Parliamentthere is a wide diversity of opinion. It is believed that the author, who as Secretary to the Parliament was obliged to obey its commands, accepted of this duty with great reluctance. His defection from the royalists, and this defence of their opponents,-though not a little tempered by recollections of ancient kindness from the throne, excited the lively indignation of May's former associates. His old acquaintance, the historian of the Great chates. His old acquaintance, the historian of the Great Rebellion, remarks that May "fell from his duty and all his former friends, and prestituted him-self to the vile office of celebrating the infanous acts of those who were in rebellion against the king; which he did so meanly that he seemed to all men to have lost his wits when he left his honesty, and shortly after died miserable and neglected, and deserves to be forgotten."—EARL OF CLARENDON: Life, vol. i.

But let up here the early of the Ford of Chathane

But let us hear the other side: the Earl of Chatham declares it to be

"a much honester and more instructive book of the same period of history than Lord Clarendon's."—Lord Chathum's Letters in his Nephew, ed. 1800, 59.

The noble editor of this little volume remarks that

"cannot by any means be considered as an impartial work. It is, however, well worthy of being attentively read; and the contemptuous character given of it by Lord Clarendon (Life, vol. 1, p. 38) is as much below its real merit as Clarendon's own history is superior to it."—Lord Gereville.
"Behold the political criticism in literature! However we may be inclined to respect the feelings of Clarendon, this will not save his gludgment nor his condour. We read May now as well as Clarendon; nor is the work of May that of a man who 'had leet his wite,' nor is it meanly performed."—Disrael's Quarrels of Authors: Miscal. of Life.ed 1840, 260.

"There is more candour in this history than the royalists were willing to allow him; but there is less elegance than one would expect from the pen of so polite and classical a scholar."—Graw-gar's Blog. Hist. of Eng., iv. 36.

MAY

"May's History of the Parliament is a just composition, according to the rules of history. It is written with much judgment, penetration, maniliness, and spirit, and with a candour that will greatly increase your esterm when you understand that he wrote by order of his masters the parliament. It breaks off (much to the loss of the history of that time) just when their armies were new-modelied by the self-denying ordinance."—Bisnor Warstrays: Letters to Hand, 4th ed. 103, 108.

"May's History of the Parliament, published in 1647, is upon a more regular and classical model than any former ambor had adopted; and had he completed the whole with as much moderation and cocheres as we taid in what is published, which there is some reason to suspect would not have been the case, on instoran of that century would have deserved a higher reputation."—Dr. John Allen: Edin. Rev., hip. 10. (Review of Lingard's Hist. of Eng.) "May's History of the Parliament is a just composition, accord-

"The latter [the Parliament' had, however, a writer who did them honour: May's History of the l'atliament is a good model of genuine English: he is plain, terse, and vigorous, never slovenly, though with few remarkable passages, and is, in style as well as substance, a kind of contrast to Clarendon."—Hallan's Lil. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii, 151.

"May's History of the Parliament is good; but it breaks off at the most interesting crists of the struggle."—Lord Macualay's Crit, and Histor. Essays, 1851, 130.

"To return to less favourable verdicts:

To return to less favourable verdicts:

"There is a flistory of the Long Parliament, by May, which is not without its value, though, from the shortness of the period which it embraces and the cold and general manner in which it is written, it will disappoint the reader, who might naturally expect much more curious matter from one who was Secretary to the House and wrote from the milist of such unprecedented scenes."

—Prof Smyth's Lect. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

"With all his apparent coolness and candour, he leans most unequivocally and decidedly to the side of the Parliament, whose proceedings he exhibits in the most plausible and imposing form, while he is ever instanting the worst construction upon those of the Court."—Green's Diary of a Lover of Let., 1810, 4to, 170. Sec 169, 171.

Echard retains his politeness, whilst not seeking to disguise his opinion, when he calls May's History "one of the genteclest and handsomest libels of those times." See also Fuller's Worthies, ed. 1840, id. 259, and authorities cited below. As an amusing contrast to Green's and

Echard's decisions, read the following:

"We know of but one work of English contemporary history not dashed with lies, as Dryden expresses it,—but one reasonably free from that spirit of party which leads to the concenhent of truth, or a musi-presentation of circumstances; we allude to the 'History of the Long Parliament.' by May, the post and Parliamentary Secretary, who wrote, as he has beautifully said, of a 'war that divided the understandings of men, as well as their affections, in so high a degree that scarce could any virtue gain due applause, any reason give satisfaction, or any relation obtain credit, unless amongst men of the same side.' "—Lon. Athenseum, Dec. 26, 1840, 1022: The Life and Tonce of Montrose, by Mark Marier.

10. The Old Couple: n Comody, 1658, 4to. Nos. 4 and 10 are reprinted in Dodsley's Collection of Old Plays. " By far the most attractive and entertaining book we have read [ since the days we were fascinated by the chef-d'œuvre of Desos or the graceful inventions of the Arabian Nights. It is truly an American novel,—not wholly American in scenery, but American in character and American in sentiment."—U. S. Mag. and Democratic Review.

We have never read a work of fiction with more interest, and, we may add, profit,—combining as it does with the most exciting and romantic adventures a great deal of information of various kinds. The heroine. Kalcolah, is about as charming and delicate a specimen of feminian mature as we recollect in any work of kinds. The heroine Kaloolah, is about as charming and delicate a specimen of feminine nature as we recollect in any work of imagination or fancy. We will answer for it that all readers will be perfectly delighted with her."—Jour, of Rincation.

"Its ancess was certain and immediate, and not many original works have ever been published in this country which had a larger circulation. It evinces remarkable fortility of invention, is exceedingly interesting, and abounds in clearly-defined, spirited, and occasionally well-finished portraitures. Kaloolah, the heroine, is a fresh and beautiful creation, worthy of any of the masters of fiction."—N. Fork Internat. Mag., iii. 443, q. v.

upon Kaloolah:

"Dr. Mayo has considerable versatility of pen: he dashes at every thing, from the ultra-grotesque to the hyper-sentimental, from the wildest fable to the most substantial matter of fact, and, if not particularly successful in some styles, in others he resuly makes what schoolboys call 'a very good offer.' But the taste of the day is by no means for extravaganza travels after the fashlon of Gulliver but without the brilliant and searching satire that larks in Liliput and Laputa."—Review of Jonathan in Africa, 66-

For almost half a century Mead was at the head of his profession, and for a number of years in receipt of an income from his practice of £5000 to £6000. (In one year it amounted to upwards of £7000.) He had a noble col-neome from his practice of £5000 to £6000. (In one year it amounted to upwards of £7000.) He had a noble collection of books, pictures, and coins, which were sold after his death for £16,047 12s. 10d.

"Yes, ever-renowned Richards Mixabi thy pharmacopaci reputation is lost in the 'blaze of thy bibliomaniantal giory.' Reculapius may plant his herbal crown round thy brow, and Hygeis may scatter her connacepla of roses at thy feet; but what are these things compared with the hounge offered thee by the Gesners, Baillets, and Le Longe of old? What avail even the roceate bluddee of thousands whom thy medical skull may have snatched from a premature grave, compared with the life, rigour, animation, and competition which thy example infused into the Book-World?"—Distant Ebbilionaria, ed 1842, 384–368.

"It is almost uppossible." remarks the enthusiastic Dibdin, in a note to the preceding, "to dwell on the memory of russ direct any without conditions of delight,—whether we consider him as an eminent physician, a friend to literature, or a collector of books, pictures, and coins. Benevolence, magnanimity, and erudition were the striking features of his character. His house was the general receptacle of men of genius and talent, and of every thing beautiful, precious, or rare. His curlosities, whether books, or coins, or pictures, were laid open to the public; and the outer-prising student and experienced antiquary slike found amusement and a courteous reception. He was known to all foreigners of intellectual distinction, and corresponded both with the artisan and the potentate."

Mede, Joseph, 1586–1638, a native of Berden, Essex, educated at and Fellow of Christ's College; Cambridge, a divine of profound learning, refused all offers of prefer-ment, and retained during his whole life his post of Reader of the Greek Lecture of Sir Walter Mildmay's foundation. As a tutor he was very successful; and, to quote the lan guage of one of his biographers,
"He was universally esteemed an accomplished scholar. He was an acute logician, an accurate philosopher, a skilful mathematician, an excellent anatomist, a great philologer, a master of many languages, and a good proficient in history and chronology."

In Oriental learning especially he was deeply versed. During his lifetime only three of his works were pub.—viz.: 1. Clavis Apocalyptica ex innatis & insitis Visionum Characteribus eruta et demonstrata, Cant., 1827, 4to. Few copies, and privately printed. To this he added, in 1832, In Sancti Joannia Apocalypsin Commentarius ad capussing In Sancti Joannis Apocalypsin Commentarius, ad amussim Clavis Apocalyptices. 2. After his death his Works were pub., 1648-52, 4to; 2d ed., 1664, 2 vols. fol.; 3d ed., 1672, fol.; 4th ed., 1877, fol.; 6th ed., 1686, fol. In the 2d ed. (1664, 2 vols. fol.)

MSS. by Dr. Worthington, (with Preface and an Account of the Author's Life).

"The third, published in 1672, has the reputation of being the best; but that it is so may be doubted, for Dr. Worthington only superintended the one published in 1664, as he died in 1671. That of 1672 is a repriat of 1664 with the following variations: some of the discourses in Book I. are divided into two, as noted below; the discourses on 1904 if. 17 and Matt. v. 23, 24 do not appear in it; and it contains a discourse on Rev. iii. 19, which is not in the edition of 1664."—Darting's Cyc. Bibl., vol. 1. 2028.

ture, epistles to learned correspondents, &c.

"Among his Posthuma, the largest, and which cost him most study, was his treatise about the doctrine of Demons."—Dr. WORTHINGTON.

The treatise referred to is The Apostasy of the Latter Times, (1642, 4to,) of which new edits. have appeared, one edited by Gregg, Lon., 12mo; one with an Introduc. by Rev. T. R. Birks, 1845, 18mo. It is greatly to be regretted that some one of the enterprising publishers of London—the Bohns, Rivingtons, Parkers, Hatchards, &c., who have given to the modern reader at a small cost the works of many ancient solid English divines—has not issued a new edit, of the Works of "the Pious and Profoundly-learned Joseph Mede." The work upon which Mede's reputation is founded is his Clavis Apocalyptica, written and pub. in Latin; first trans. into English in written and pub. in Latin; first trans. into English in 1643, and several times since. The last English trans. is that by R. Bransby Cooper,—"from the Latin of the latest Edition of the Rev. Joseph Mede,"—1838, 8vo. See Cooper, R. Branshy. Another trans., "by a clergyman of the Established Church," appeared in 1831, 12mo. The greater part of Bishop Hurd's Tenth Sermon on the Study of the Prophecies is devoted to the consideration of the Clavis Apocalyptica. Referring to the many previous attemnts of Biblical critics to explain the Apocalymians of Biblical critics to explain the Apocalymians. vious attempts of Biblical critics to explain the Apocalypse, the bishop remarks,

The issue of much claborate enquiry was that the book itself was disgraced by the fruitless efforts of its commentators, and on the point of being given up as utterly impenetrable, when a sublime pentus arose [Siele] in the beginning of the last century, and time primes arise precess in the beginning of the bast century, and surprised the learned world with that great desideratum,—a key to the Revelotions"—Hurd's Works. v. 270.

"Mede is universally allowed to have led the way to a correct and rational interpretation of the Apocalypse."—Horne's Bibl. Bib., 1839, 331.

Bib. 1839, 331.

"All subsequent writers have either been indebted to Mede's Key or have found it necessary to combat his views. . . . Mede regards the seven epistics to the Asiatus churches as prophetical. The great object of the key is to point out the order of the several prophecies, and what he calls the synchronisms of the several series of predictions and events. In both he is certainly very successful. He was a millenarian, or a believer in the first resurrection, and in the personal reign of Christ 1000 years before the general resurrection."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"It has ever been considered as a rich mine, of which all subsequent learned commentators have made free and good use."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P., 1843, 294.

"He first haid open the method of the Book of Revelation, and

"He first hald open the method of the Book of Revelation, and led the way to that system of interpretation which, in the main, has been since adopted by the generality of Profestant commentators. . . Vitrings ably discusses and refutes some of Mede's interpretations: see also Dean Woodhouse."—Bickersteth's C. S. 1844, terpretations: see also bean Woodhouse."—Bickersteth's C. S. 1844, 248.

"The fame of Mede has rested, for the most part, on his interpretations of the Apocalypse. . . Those of Mede have been received with favour by late interpreters."—Hallan's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 1854, H. 357.

"Modern expositors of the prophecies contained in the Revelation and book of Daniel have properly availed themselves of the lights held out to them by this great divine."—Rishop Warson.

Nor should Mede's other productions be neglected:

"Joseph Mede," remarks Dr. Williams. "was a man of deep plety and of extraordinary learning. His works—all of which are singularly curious and instructive—afford most important assistance to those who are engaged in studying the more difficult parts of the prophotic writings. His Life, which is prefixed to the folio edition of his works, is an invaluable piece of literary history. A correct reprint of Mede is at present greatly needed."—Christics Preasher, 1843, 388.

"It is strictly and mainly because 'Leonilda' is a poem,—a work with a beginning, middle, and end,—a theme which is aderned, and not checked, by episodes,—a subject in which fancy is the framework of contemplation, as it should always be.—that we place it work of contemplation, as it should always be.—that we place it work of the best poems of the year. We could, if we choose, endeavour to make the fame of Felix Medired by quoting a series of flustrious aphorisms or a string of splendid figures. Many poets, destitute of construction, gain applause in this way; but we design to rest his fame on higher grounds."—Len. Critic.

at so high a rate:

"As a poet he enjoyed a higher reputation in his lifetime than his works will preserve. They are without vigour of thought or language, and are often dreamy, mystic, and unintelligible. In his writings there is no evidence of creative genius; he original, clear, and manly thought; no spirited and natural descriptions of life or nature; no humour, no nathos, no passion; nothing that appeals to the common sympathies of mankind."—Packs and Pintry of America, 16th ed., 1855, 267.

Melmoth, William, 1666-1743, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, in conjunction with Peere Williams was the pub. of Vernon's Reports (see Vernon, Thomas) by order of the Court of Chancery, but is best known by his work entitled The Great Importance of a Religious Life, of which nearly 50,000 copies were sold within twenty years after the first publication: more than 100,000 copies were disposed of between 1743 and '82. Horace Walpole, in Royal and Noble Authors, erroneously ascribes this work to the first Earl of Egmont. It is now but little known. His translations of Cleero and of Fliny will speak for him while Roman and English eloquence can be united. brief notices of his characteristics as a preacher:

"He has published several volumes of sermons, which, although written in a highly imaginative and cloquent strain, are amongst the most admirable specimens of practical divinity in the English language."—Rone's Ecclesiastica: The Church, her Schools and Clergy. Lon., 1842, 8vo.

"As sermons they are defective, we should say, in simplicity and directness of style,—especially in close and pungent appeals to the conscience. But as specimens of leavity and finish in composition they are not often excelled. The preacher's elequence seems too artificial, and his matter is often too speculative and abstrues; but his phrassedogy is figurative and richly ornate, his analogies exceedingly happy, his arrangement (though not sufficiently marked) natural and easy, his sentences are nicely balanced, and his periods smoothly rounded; and yet, with all their polish, force is not sacrificed, and, what is hetter than all, the scriptural or evangelical element is not wanting."—Fish's Pulpit Eloquence of the Nindeenth Centery, N. York, 1837, 503-504.

"Popular, evangelical, and useful, with many thoughts gathered from other preachers and made striking by his own eloquence."—Bioksrách's C. S. 1844, 494.

"For real power, for thought, and for eloquence, rarely—indeed, but too rarely—does the world see such volumes as Mr. Melvill's."—British Magazine.

upon truths as expressed and connected in the Bible, instead of topics as insulated or classified according to the ways of man's wisdom. This is precisely as it should be. He who preaches upon subjects in derivity instead of pussages of Scripture, fitting

quence:

"Hearing Mr. Melvill was like walking, as did Aladdin, through aremus on either side of which were naught but glittering treasures. His style was ornamented to the utimat; yet it was evident enough that elaboration had been sedulously practised. Indeed, we have heard that Mr. Melvill writes and rewrites his sermons until they arrive at his standard of perfection; and a high standard it is. A week, it is said, he not unfrequently devotes to the composition of a single discourse; and we can easily believe it, for every sermon he delivers is characterised by the most minute attention to every portion thereof. There is no sentence but what is exquisitely balanced, no period which is not seignally counsed; every simile is perfect and apt, every descriptive possage is graphic in the extreme. Yet, with all this polish, the power is not impulred; the force is not lost in the polish. Bujdly proceeds the ortor, never for a moment flagging nor becoming commonplace; as soon as one rainbow begins to fade, another as brilliant successis;

"Like the ways of the summer, when one discarsay."

'Like the waves of the summer, when one dieraway, Another as bright and as shining comes on.'

"The fountain from whence this stream of magic eloquence springs appears to be exhaustless. For three quarters of an hour the listeners in the solemn side appear spell bound; and, indeed, they are so, for they are channed by the so potent eloquence of a master of his art. At length the music of the preachers voice begins to die away, and, as if ceases altogather, a suppressed marmur of approbation runs through the church,—a mariour which elsewhere would have burst into a shout of applause,"—Jon., 1852, 283–295. 1852, 298-295

The lively author of Random Recollections devotes a large space in his Metropolitan Pulpit to a description of

Interpretation of Random Recollections devotes a large space in his Metropolitan Pulpit to a description of Mr. Melvill's personal and pastoral characteristics:

"He is certainly the greatest rhetoriclan among our metropolitan preachers. His figures are often bold and happy, and give an effect to his matter which it would not otherwise produce. He clothes the most commonplace ideas in language which is so rich in the ornaments of rhetoric that they are often mistaken for conceptions of the most being in limitations. If he hit on a striking idea, the chance is that, in the plentitude of his anxiety to cabibit that idea in every possible light, he will so far overwork it as to weaken the impression which a less ample illustration could not fall to have made. He is exceedingly partial to the use of analogy in addressing his heavers. He illustrates and enforces the truths of religion by the incidents and occurrences of ordinary life. And his analogies are often exceedingly happy; at times they are particularly striking. . Mr. Melvill seldom makes any formal division of his subject. You seldom hear of first, second, or third places in his discourses. His arrangement has much of the sessifier the elegy of the Church of England. They usually occupy from the tessy of the Church of England. They usually occupy from the to-seven minutes in the delivery. His sermons altogethe do not occupy more than three-quarters of an hour; but such is the rapidity of his otternoc that he speaks as much in that time as another preacher, speaking at the average rate, would do in a full hour. . He arrest the heaver's attention the listant he commences, and carries him with him, a willing capitive, to the close of his sermon. So far, Indeed, from the andlence being pleased at their restoration to liberty,—that is, at Mr. Melvill's concluding his discourse,—they are sorry he does not continue longer. They would willingly listen to him for another three-quarters of an hour, or even for the enemed; and yet his ferviour of his manner does not lowing:

"It affords me pleasure to state that he is most exemplary and indefatigable in his visits to the sick and dying, and that in such casce he is as prompt in visiting the poor as the rich. I have reason to believe that he has been eminently useful in this way. It is highly to his credit that, in order that he may have the more time to devote to his visits to the sick and dying, he declines in-numerable invitations of a most pressing nature to dinner and other parties."—Ibid., 18.

Melville, Herman, b. Aug. 1, 1819, in the city of New York, a descendant of an ancient Scotch family, in his 18th year made a voyage from New York to Liverpool, and back home, before the mast, and liked his marine experience sufficiently to embark on a whaling-vessel for the Pacific, Jan. 1, 1841. About July of the next year, the vessel arrived at Nuksheva, one of the Marquesas Islands, and Melville, with a fellow-sailor, who like himself was tired of strait quarters and a tyrannical captain, embraced the opportunity of leaving the ship without waiting for the usual formality of a discharge. Falling into the hands of a warlike race who inhabit the Typee Valley, McIville was detained a prisoner for four months, when he was unexpectedly rescued by the crow of a Sidney whaler. After passing several months in the Society and Sandwich Islands, the adventurer shipped on board the frigate United States and arrived at Boston in October, 1844, having been absent from home nearly three years. In 1847, Mr. Melville was married to a daughter of Chief-Justice Shaw, of Boston, and has for some years resided at Berkshire, Massachusetts. That he was no unobservant spectator of the peculiar phases of society which he encountered during his travels, we have ample evidence in several descriptive volumes which he has since given to the world. "Since the joyous moment when we first read Robinson Crusoe—and believed it all, and wondered all the more because we believed—was have not met with so bewitching a work as this narrative of Herman Melville's."—Sohn Bull.

"This is really a very curious book. A little colouring there may be here and there; but the result is a thorough impression of reality."—Lon. Examiner.

"The book is a great curiosity in one point of view; it is the first account that has been published of a residence among the natives of the Polynesian Islands, by a person who has lived with them in their ewn fashion, and, as near as may be, on terms of social equality. Lon. Speciator.

"That Mr. Melville will favour us with his further adventures we have no doubt whatever. We shall expect them with implicance and receive them with pleasure. He is a companion after our own hearts. His voice is pleasant; and if we could see his face we are sure we should find it a cheerful one. —Lon. Times.

The book is excellent, quite first-rate.—the 'clear grit,' as Mr. Melville's countrymen would say."—Blackw. Mag., 1xt. 754-767.

It required close knowledge of the world, and of the Yankee world, to write such a book, and make the satite acute and telling and the scenes not too improbable for the fault given to fiction. Perhaps the moral is, the guilibility of the great Republic when taken on its own tack. . . . Few Americans write so powerfully as Mr. Melville, or in better English; and we shall look forward with pleasure to his promised continuation of the Masquerade. The First Part is a remarkable work, and will add to his reputation. *——Westminster Rev., July. 1857.

In this book, philosophy is brought out of its cloisters into the living world: the issue reased is, whether men are to be trusted or suspected. . . The charm of the book is owing to its originality and to its constant flow of descriptions, character sketching, and dialogue, deeply toned and skilfully contrasted. —Lon. Leader.*

We have already made several quotations from a general review of Mr. Melville's works (Nos. 1-7) in the Dublin University Magazine. The critic at the conclusion of his article remarks.

"Herman Melville is undoubtedly an original thinker, and boldly and nareservedly expresses his opinions, often in a way that irresistibly startles and enchains the interest of the reader. He possesses amazing powers of expression: he can be terse, copions, eloquent, brilliant, imaginative, poetical, satirical, pathetic, at will. He is never stupid, never dull; but, alas! he is often mystical and unintelligible,—sor from any mability to express himself, for his writing is pure, manly English, and a child can always understand what he says.—but the ablest critic cannot always tell what he really MEANS.

"Such is Herman Melville! A man of whom America has reason to be proud, with all his faults; and, if he does not eventually rank as one of her greatest glants in literature, it will not be owing to any lack of innate genius, but solely to his own incorrigible perversion of his rare and lofty gifts."

classical scholar and exquisite poet, who served with great distinction under Prince Ferdinand in Germany, was the son of Thomas Mercer, of Aberdeenshire, whose zealous advocacy of the interests of the Stuarts and his com-plicity in the Rebellion of 1745 obliged him to retire to France. James Mercer was educated at the University of Aberdeen, under the celebrated Professor Blackwall, and imbibed from his tutor that love of Greek literature which the toils of the camp and the blandishments of the social circle were unable to cradicate in after-years. He retired from the army about 1772, when upon the point of being advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and, with the exception of a short interval during the war with America, and a few years' residence in the South of France, spent the rest of his life in literary sociusion at Aberdeenshire, occasionally entertaining a few friends attracted alike by the crudition of the military scholar and the aztraordinary beauty of Mrs. Morcer, (formerly Miss Katherine Donglass,) whose accomplishments in their kind were not inferior to those of her husband.

"From these passages, which have been selected at random," remarks the critic, "the reader may be enabled to form a very fair estimate of the style and peculiar merits of the poems contained in this little volume; and we doubt not that the while collection will be found to justify the praise we have ventured to bestow upon it. To that praise, however well merited, the exollent author himself can now no longer be sensible; and, by a singular coincidence, we may with characteristical propriety apply to him the lument of a c-debrated Scottish poet of the sixteenth century for the loss of a contemporary bard of the same name:

Meredith, Owen, the nom de plume of Robert, only son of Sir Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer Lytton, has gained considerable poetical reputation by a volume of poems pub. in 1855, under the title of Clytemnestra. The Earl's Return, The Artist, and other Poems. We extract a few lines from several reviews before us of this volume:

a few lines from several reviews before us of this volume:

"That this volume indicates remarkable ability in so young a writer as we understand its author to be is unquest-brable; but whether that ability includes the exceedingly rare conjunction and balance of intellectual forces which constitute the nature of an original poet is more than we can undertake to determine from the evidence before us." — Fin. Rev., Oct. 1856; New Poets, q. v. "The author of "Clytennesta" may take his rank above the Minor Minstrels. His gifts and his faults are not the gifts and faults of gentlemen 'who write with case." He has an eye for colour; the ser is open for the cries of nature; he feels the bush of neon and the silence of midnight; and that which he thinks clearly and feels deeply he can express with rare felicity and power."—Low.

Athen. 1855, 426.

"If one may prophesy with safety of the day by watching the tokens that accompany the dawn, we may predict satisfactory issue from the rich poetical promise which in this volume breaks over the flat waste of contemporary verse."—Lon. Examiner.

"He is yet far from having developed the powers that are in him. Naturalness of expression runs into affectation; the metre is sometimes peculiar in itself, and, from negligence or love of singularity, becomes hards in the execution; the perception of natural beauty runs wild, and description overlays his theme instead of setting it off; his subjects are not always good in themselves, or else they are improperly treated. But he has the spirit and feeling of a genulm poot; the defects of his volume are such as judgment could have prevented, and in many cases even revision remove."—Lon. Spectator.

Notwithstanding this hint, Emérigon's Treaties on Insurance did not appear in an English dress until 1850.

"No one could have looked into that agreeable miscellany of scholarship, the Arundines Cami, without becoming aware that Mr. Merivale possesses one qualification at least for an historian of the Romans,—an intimate acquaintance with their language and literature. . . We have read these volumes with great pleasure, and we close them with even greater expectation. . . Our readers will perceive that Mr. Merivale's undertaking is nothing loss than to bridge over no small portion of the interval between the interrupted work of Arnold and the commencement of Orbbon. He comes, therefore, between 'mighty opposites.' It is praise enough that in this, his first instalment, he proves himself no unworthy successor to the two most gifted historians of Rome whom English literature has yet produced."—Edin. Mr. Merivale does not display the brilliancy or rerve of Gibbon or Mecaulay; but he evidently has ample powers of doing justice to his subject, and of pr ducing a work on Roman history which will take a very high position in English literature."—Lon. "We perceive an increasing propensity, in our own country, to load and everload new editions of professional works with notes of little intrinsic value, or, at most, with notes whose value is materially diminished by the loose and unskilled manner in which they are introduced. There are, however, some exceptions to this remark; and none are entitled to more praise that the learned comments of Mr. Metcalf."—Juna Josepi Story: N. Amer. Spain is divided between ultra-infidelity and what is so closely akin to actual idulatry that it can only be controversally, not practically, distinguished from it; and over all hangs a lurid cloud of systematic immorality, simply frightful to contemplate. "The Ludad is best known in England by the translation of Mickle, who has been thought to have done something more than justice to his author, both by the unmeasured culogies he bestows upon him and by the more substantial service of excelling the original in his unfaithful delineation. The style of Mickle is certainly more poetical, according to our standard, than that of Camcens.—that is, more figurative and emphatic; but it seems to facility and sweetness of the original, in which it is well known that he has interpolated a great deal without a protence."—Hallan's Lit. more than he was well qualified to perform. Some things he kept out of sight, others he softened, others he elevated and enriched.
Wherever he thought any thing could be inserted with advantage,

Middleton, Conyers, D.D., 1683-1750, a native of York, educated at, and Fellow (1706) of, Trinity College, Cambridge, about 1722 became Principal Librarian of the Public Library at Cambridge, and towards the close of his life was presented to the living of Hascomb, in Surrey. He was "a man of war from his youth;" and, had his judgment been equal to his learning, he might have obtained a place in the first rank of English lettens. Several of his more prominent controversies have already been noticed on preceding pages, (see Bentley, Richard. D.D., pp. 170, 171; Hooks, Nathamel, p. 877, &c.; and others must be referred to in some of our future articles. The first occasion which elicited Middleton's remarkable powers as a writer was an extraordinary de-mand made by Dr. Bentley of four guineas, in addition to the usual fee of one broad piece, for performing the cere-mony of creation when the former was made Doctor of Divinity. After a vigorous remonstrance against this exaction, Middleton and the other divines upon whom the same tax was levied paid the fee upor condition that it should be restored if it should be afterwards decided to be illegal. But, when an award was given in favour of the protestants, Bentley refused to return the money, and Middleton commenced an action against him for his share of the fees thus illegally withheld. This famous controversy has been already sufficiently noticed in our life of RICHARD BENTLEY. In this place, therefore, we need only refer to (1-4) Middleton's four tracts against Bentley, (1710-20,) of the first of which (A Full and Impartial Account of all the late Proceedings in the University of Cambridge against Dr. Bentley) Bishop Monk remarks "was the first published specimen of a style which, for elegance was the first published specimen of a tyte which, for elegance, purity, and case, yields to mote in the whole compass of the Engilish language. The acrimonious and resentful feeling which prompted every line is in some measure disguised by the pleasing language, the harmony of the periods, and the vein of scholarship which onliven the whole tract. —Life of Bentley.

which only the whole tract."—Life of Bendry.

Bentley made no secret of his contempt for his adversary; but "Fiddling Conyors," as the former had styled him with reference to his known fondness for nusical performances, proved that, when need required, he could handle a pen to as much purpose as a violin.

In 1720 Bentley put forth his Proposals for Printing a New Edition of the Greek Testament, and Middleton assailed his foe with such success in his (5) Romarks upon the Proposals, 1721, 4to, that the enemy was fairly driven from the field. See p. 171 of this Dictionary; Disraeli's Mircell. of Literature; and Quarrels of Authors, ed. 1840, 313. This doughty controversialist had now given to the public a sufficient acquaintance with his powers to insure a lively interest in any thing which might proceed from his pen. His principal publications after 1720 were the following. 6. Bibliotheca Cantabrigiensis Ordinanda Methodus quædam, Cantab., 1723, 4to. 7. A Letter from Rome, showing an Exact Conformity between Popery and Paganism; or, The Religion of the Present Romans de-rived from that of their Heathen Ancestors, Lon., 1729, 4to; 1733, 4to; 4th ed., with a Prefatory Discourse and Appendix, 1741, 8vo; new ed., with Addit. Proofs by Publicula, 1812, 8vo; 1813, 8vo. In this reprint there are several alterations and omissions. 8. A Letter to Waterland, containing some Remarks on his Tract entitled Vindication of Scripture; together with the Sketch or Plan of another Answer to Tindal's Book, 1731, anon. Bishop Pearce pub. an answer to this Letter, which elicited (9) A Defence of the Letter to Dr. Waterland against the (9) A Defence of the Letter to Dr. Wateriand against the False and Frivolous Objections of the Author of the Reply, 1731, anon. Pearce replied to this Defence, still treating the author as an infidel; and, that author being now known to be Middleton,—who had already excited doubts of his orthodoxy by his Letter from Rome,-he was in danger of losing his degrees and office of librarian. Promising, however, to publish a satisfactory vindication of his course, the authorities withheld their intended degradation; and in 1732 Middleton gave to the world (10) Some Remarks on Dr. Poarce's Second Reply, &c.; wherein the Author's Sentiments as to all the Principal Points in dispute are fully and clearly Explained in the Manner that had been promised. As in this manifesto the writer strongly asserted his belief in Christianity and disavowed any intention to cast doubt upon its evidences, he saved any intention to east doubt upon its evidences, he saved himself from degradation, but not from strong suspicion of hypoerisy; and this has ever since attached to his name. 11. A Dissertation concerning the Origin of Print-ing in England; showing that it was first introduced and practised by our Countryman William Caxton, at West-minster, and not, as is commonly believed, by a Foreign minster, and not, as is commonly believed, by a Foreign Printer at Oxford, Camb., 1735, 4to; reprinted in the 5th vel. of his Miscell. Works, 1755. It was trans. into French by D. G. Imbert, 8vo. See Arkvis, Richard; Bowver, William; Caxton, William; Nichols's Lit. Anec., Index; English bibliographical works, passin. 12. Hist. of the Life of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Lon., 1741, 2 vols. 4to. 13. The Epistles of M. T. Cicero to M. Brutus, and of Brutus to Cicero, Myth the Latin Text on the opposite page, and English Notes to each Epistle; together with a Prefatory Dissertation, in which the Authority of the said Epistles is Vindicated, and all the Objections of the Rev. Mr. Tunstall particularly Considered and Confuted, 1743. This Profatory Discourse was elicited by Tunstall's Epistola ad Middleton, 1741, 8vo; and the Discourse provoked Tunstall's Observations on the Epistles between Cicero and M. Brutus, 1744, 8vo. The importance of this controversy has been rather exaggerated by the critic next to to be quoted:

"The authenticity of the Correspondence between Ciocro and Brutus has formed the subject of a literary controversy perhaps the most celebrated which has ever occurred, except that concerning the Epistles of Phalaris. Tunatall denied their genuineness in his Epistola ad Mikilleton, who answered with considerable and unprovided aspertly, which produced Trustall's Observations." See Dunlop's Hist. of Roman Lit.

We have now to consider the merits and demerits of the work by which the name of Conyers Middleton will always be best known to the general reader .- The Life of Cicero.

The author remarks, with much truth,

"As to the nature of my work, though the title of it carries nothing more than The History of Cleero's Lite, yet it might properly enough be called The History of Cicero's Times."—Original Proface.

The edition of Cicero's Life which the reader must prooure is that pub. by H. G. Bohn, Lon., 1848, imp. 8vo, which includes Cicero's Letters to several of his Friends, by Melmoth, (see Melmoth, William,) and Letters to Attieus, by Heberden. In the words of an enthusiastic

"This book is a library, the whole Corpus of Tully. What a fund of genius, what elequence, what feeling, is contained in these eight hundred pages!"—Lon. Let. Gazette.

This animated laudation may remind the reader of the calmer but equally eulogistic language of the great historian of Rome:

"After finishing this great author and library of eloquence and reason, I read and applicated the observation of Quintilian,—that every student may judge of his own proficiency by the satisfaction which he receives from Cicero."—Gibson.

The only deficioncy of which we are aware in the volume fust recommended—and a grave fault it is in any book—is the want of a General Index: see Ayscorga, SAML. To this volume the reader must not fail to add Cicero's Treatise on the Commonwealth and Laws, translated, with Dissertations, Illustrations, and Notes from other Authors, Divine, Canonical, Civil, &c., by Barham, 1812, 2 vols. 8vo. But to our promised consideration of the merits and demorits of Middloton's Life of Cicero,—to which, by the way, there were no less than 3000 subscribers, whose united payments enabled the rejoicing author to retire to a pleasant farm at Hildersham, where he carried on his literary researches without interruption:

Ricu. Goous: Nichols's Lit. Ance., v. 413, 414, q. v. for some other opinions on this work, brief extracts from which we present:

"The style of Middleton, which is commonly extremed very pure, is biomished with many vulgar and cant terms; such as, Pompey had a month's mind, &c. He has not been successful in the translations of those many epistles of Tully which he has inserted, which, however curious, yet break the thread of the narration. Mongault and Melinoth have far exceeded him in their excellent translations of those pieces; which are, after all, some of the most precious remains of antiquity. . . It is a pleasing and usually work, especially to younger readers, as it gives a comprehensive view of a most interesting period in the Roman history, and of the characters principally concerned in those important syvonts." —Dr. Warken's E.say on Pope, it 324.

Had Middleton's term of years been extended to a patriarchal longevity, we presume that he would have continually found fresh delight in fresh disputations; but the time had now arrived for his encounter with a foe who is proverbial for having every thing his own way, who never condescends to argue, and with whom remonstrance is of no avail. But he died, as we have seen, with the armour on his back and the lance in his hand. Among the best-known of Middleton's plays are A Mad World, my Masters, and The Roaring Girl, (in this he was assisted by Decker;) but nothing has fended so much to preserve him from oblivion as the similarity between parts of his play of The Witch, a Tragi-Comedy, and the witch scenes in Macbeth. In the consideration of the question how far the indebtedness of Shakspeare to Middleton herein can be fairly traced, perhaps the priority of The. Witch has been too easily admitted. As this play was never printed befor the year 1778, when Isaac Basel had.

104 espies struck off for private distribution, it would be very difficult to prove that Middleton had not borrowed from Macbeth,—especially as we have evidence, as just asserted, that the author of The Witch continued to use his dramatic pen until the year of his death. That one borrowed from the other is not for a moment to be questioned; and how closely, a comparison between the witchscene in Mucbeth and the following extract from Middleton's Witch will show the curious render:

m's Witch will show the curious render:

"(The Witches going about the cauldron,)
Black spirits, and white; red spirits, and grey;
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may.

Titty, Tiffin, keep it stiff in:

Firedrake, Puckey, make it lucky;
Likrd, Robin, you must bob in Bound, around, around, about, about;
All ill come running in; all good keep out!"

Yet is there a wast difference between the witches of iddlaton, and those of Shukspaper: and this difference

Middleton and those of Shakspeare; and this difference has been well expressed by Churles Lamb:

Example of the control of the control of the characteristics of th serious our given to us mage excite suites. The Weirt Sisters are serious things. Their presence cannot coexist with mirth. But, in a lesser degree, the witches of Middleton are fine creations. Their power, too, is in some measure over the mind. They raise jars, jealousles, strifes, 'like a thick scurf' over life.'—Charac. of Dramet. Writers.

"The large of Middleton are, however, drawn with a bold and terrific sisterhood of Shakspeare, and the traditionary with of the "Ilumour, wit, and character, though in a degree inferior to that which distinguishes the preceding poets, [see the text,] are to be found in the comedy of Middleton, and occasionally a pleasing interchange of elegant imagery and tender sentiment. His tragedy is not devoid of pathos, though possessing little dignity or olevation: but there is in many of his plays, and especially in the tragiconcely of The Witch, a strength and compass of imagination which entities him to a very respectable rank among the cultivators of the romentic drama. "Diot., 565-566.

"Middleton's style," remarks Mr. Hazlitt, "was not marked by any peculiar quality of his own, but was made up, in equal proportions, of the faults and excellences common to his contemporaries.
In his "Women beware Women' there is a rich marrowy voin of internal sentiment, with fine occasional insight into human mature and cool cutting irony of expression. He is lamentably deficient in the plot and denouement of the story."—Lects on the

After a brief survey of the characteristics of a number of the minor "dramatists under the first Stuarts," the accomplished historian of The Literature of Europe re-abormplished historian of The Literature of Europe remarks,

"Middleton belongs to this lower class of dramatic writers; his tragedy entitled 'Women bewere Women' is founded on the story of Biance Capella; it is full of action, but the characters are all too vicious to be interesting, and the language does not rise much shove medicerity. In comedy Middleton deserves more prolec.

Whilst curate of Gainsborough, Mr. Middleton edited the Country Spectator, to which he contributed most of the papers; and for some time he discharged the editorial duties connected with the British Critic. lish Notes, 1831.

"This is a book of profound learning and most masterly criticism. The first part of it is occupied with an inquiry into the nature and uses of the Greek article, and the second contains the application of the views previously established to the interpretation of many passages in the New Testament. The extensive philological attainments of the learned writer are made most happily to bear on a number of difficult texts, and especially on some in which the doctrine of the diwinity of Christ is contained. This path of criticism was first opened by the excellent Granville Sharp; but no one has prosecuted it with so much ability and industry as Dr. Middleton. The Eclectic reviewer of this work thus concludes a very able article: 'We regard Dr. Middleton's second part as a more original and a nore serviceable accession to the treusures of biblical philology than the confessedly meritorious labours of Bos, Elsner, and Raphelius.'"—Orme's Bibl. Bib., 1824, 318.

"The value of Bishop Middloton's treatise has been too long "The value of Bishop Middloton's treatise has been too long and too well known to require any additional testimony to its merits in this place. The opposers of the doctrine of our Baylour's supreme divinity eaviled at, but could not fairly refure, the convining philological proofs accumulated by Bp. M."—Horne's Hibl. Bib., 1839, 210. "The theory was not proposed by its highly-gifted framer without hat severe and impartial scrutiny for which his deep critical acumen and thoughtful turn of mind rendered him poculiarly qualified; and, though it has been frequently disputed, no definite objections have been urged against it as a whole, nor are the violations of its rules either so numerous or important as to invalidate in the slightest degree the soundness of the hypothesis."—W. Trolloge's Greek Grammar to the New Testament.

p. 8vo, 6s. cach. This valuable History was commenced by Mr. Mill as early as 1806, although, as we have seen, not pub. until twelve years later.

"Those parts in which picturesque description and the power of warm and interesting narrative might have been displayed are not made the most of by him. But, in the careful investigation of facts and of the inferences to be drawn from them, in illustrating his subject by help of the widest range of historical knowledge, in discriminating between the real and apparent causes of events, in the examination of policy, in the exposition of the motives of the actors and the consequences of their acts, in unfolding

"the drift of hollow states hard to be spelled," he leaves little to be desired. . . We cannot speak as favourably of Mr. Mill's style as of his matter. It has many marks of carelessness and some of bad taste, and the narration in a few instances is not free from that greatest of all defects,—obscurity,—which has arisen from an inattention to the use of the tenses of the verbs. In his disquisitions it is vigorous, though not always pure or dignified; and violations of the use of language with respect to particular words are not unfrequently to be met with. But of all these faults our readers will be able to judge from the extracts more severely than we can ourselves, who rise from the reading of the book grateful for the vast hody of information which it conveys, and impressed with respect not only for the intellectual qualities of the author but for his high and rare virtues as an historian."—Edin. Rev., xxxi. 1-44, q. v.

We continue our notices of Mr. Mill's History of India: We continue our notices of Mr. Mill's History of India: "We know no writer who takes so much pleasure in the truly useful, noble, and philosophical employment of tracing the progress of sound opinions from their embryo state to their full maturity. He eagerly culis from old despatches and minutes every expression in which he can discern the imperfect germ of any great truth which has since been fully developed. He never falls to bestow praise on those who, though far from coming up to his standard of perfection, yet rise in a small degree above the level of their contemporaries. It is thus that the annals of past times ought to be written. It is thus, especially, that the annals of our own country ought to be written."—Lorn Macaulay: Essays, Lon., 1834, ii. 76, 77; from Edin Rev., July, 1836.

India for his success in treating the abstruse subjects discussed in his work

"In a manner and within a compass that makes them universally intelligible and attractive,"

the Quarterly reviewer adds that

"Sir John Malcolm's writings possess in these respects a decided superiority over those of Mr. Mill; for, although the latter contain unquestionably much information on every point connected with the history, religion, and general situation of British India and its inhabitants, the whole is presented in a shape and style that tends to discourage rather than to promote the pursuit of the subject by ordinary readers."—Lon. "The labour which has been employed in collecting and examining materials, the skilful distribution of the facts into proper compartments, the light tone of moral feeling and the enlarged philosophy which everywhere pervade the narrative, entitle the 'History of British India' to be regarded as a valuable addition to our national literature. The extensive circulation of Mr. Mil's History will be a benefit both to England and to India."—British Review, No. 24.

Mr. Mill was by no means accused of flattering the governors of the powerful corporation the consideration of the management and influences of which necessarily occupies a large portion of his volumes:

"With all its merits, therefore, something was wanting before Mill's History of British India could take rank as a standard national work. The deficiencies have now been amply supplied: indeed, no living man could be found better able to correct Mr. Mill's errors and modify his too sweeping conclusions than Professor H. H. Wilson, a destinguished Oriental scholar. long a resident in India and familiar with the habits and manners of its diversified inhabitants."—Athensum.

"There is scarcely, perhaps, another man in England so well qualified to undertake a new edition of this great work as the Boden Professor of Sanscrit at Oxford. Mr. Wilson brings to the Boden Professor of Sanscrit at Oxford. Mr. Wilson brings to the Boden Professor. In editing a new edition of Mil's History of India, there is much to be done which Mr. Wilson is well able to do, and which, as far as those volumes enable us to judge, he will owith the best offect, in correcting the numerous errors of opinion as well as fact which are scattered through that great work. Mr. Wilson's notes are full and to the purpose; and, upon the whole, this work, thus edited, is likely to form an era in the historical literature of the age,"—Lon. Adas.

the doctrines of Thomas Hobbes,—see p. 855 of this Dic-tionary,—where, by-the-way, it will be seen that, if Mos-sicurs Hobbes and Mill are right, there are more great names justly liable to the charge of error than those of Mackintosh and Macaulay. How far Mr. Mill has made good his censures of Mackintosh's Dissertation, on general grounds, it must be left to the reader to decide.

Mill, Job. Practice of Conveyancing, 1745, fol. Mill, John. Praxis Criminalis, Figuris Ligneis Blus-

Mill, John, D.D., 1645-1707, a native of Shap, West-moreland, entered as servitor of Queen's College, 1661; Rector of Blechingdon, Oxfordshire, 1681; Principal of St. Edmund's Hall, 1685; Prob. of Canterbury, 1704. Mill is famous for having devoted the labour of thirty years to the preparation of a new edition of the Greek Testament, and finished it only fourteen days before his death: 'H KAINH AIAOHKH. Novum Testamentum Gruccum, cum Lectionibus Variantibus MSS. Exempliarum, Versionum, Editionum SS. Patrum et Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, et in easdem notis: Studio et labore Joannis Millii, S. T. P. Oxonii, e Theatre Sheldoniano, 1707, fol. The "various readings" are reckoned about 30,000. The text is that of Robert Stephens's edit., 1550. Dr. Whithy attacked the work in his Examen Variantum Lectionum Johannis Millii, 1710, (afterwards annexed to Whitby's Commentary on the New Testament;) but Michaelis, Marsh, Harwood, and critical scholars gene-Whitby's objections to the work were based upon the fear that the authenticity of the text would be deemed doubtful if so many readings were allowed to be matters of criticism; and Anthony Collins, in his Discourse upon Free-Thinking, quotes a passage of Whitby's to this effect, as a confirmation of his arguments against the New Testament. But the great Bentley, under the signature of Philoleutherus Lipsiensis, rebuked Collins in a manner long to be remembered, as we have already shown in our lives of RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D., and ANTHONY COL-LINS, pp. 171, 412 of this Dictionary. Dr. John Gregory (see our life of John Fell, D.D., p. 584 of this Dictionary) raises the same objection which Whitby urges. Michaelia

remarks that ***
"the infancy of critics" ands with the edition of Gregory, and the age of manhood conseners with that of Mill."

Mill's edition ranks next to that of Wetstein in im-Portance and utility. The prolegomena are beyond price:

Mill is sometimes called the editor of Malelas's Chronicle; but it seems to have been only published under his superintendence,-Chilmead, who supervised the proofs, dying before the work was issued.

Indeed, he feels that he can claim no other merit than that of having applied to some special cases, and carried out further than have been previously done, those principles of research in natural science which have been laid down by that distinguished philosopher."—Lumia: Preface to Animal Chemistry.

While Whately, with some show of reason, resolved induction into deduction or syllogism proper, Mill most preposterously resolved all deduction into induction, and thereby consummated the degradation of logic. . . land, laboured for about fifteen years as a quarryman, and subsequently filled for six years the situation of accountant in a bank in his native village. Although deprived of the opportunities of early education, he evinced a great fond ness for reading, and from time to time contributed articles to the Inverness Courier and other periodicals, and even ventured to publish asmall volume of poetry, now forgotten, and a volume of prose sketches, (see No. 2.) likely to be remembered. When the great question of the disruption of the Church of Scotland agitated the minds of the people to an unwonted degree, Hugh Miller was one of the many who displayed literary abilities the existence of which was little suspected by their most familiar friends. In 1839, after the decision of the House of Lords in the Auchterarder Case. the quondam stone-mason drew upon himself the eyes of his countrymen by his Letter from one of the Scotch People to the Right Hon. Lord Brougham and Vaux, on the Opinions expressed by his Lordship in the Auchterarder Case. This "elegant and masculine production of Hugh Miller"—as it was denominated by Mr. Gladstone in his Church Principles-led to the establishment, by the Free Church Party, of The Witness, a semi-weekly newspaper, and the letter-writer was invited to assume its editorial He accepted the proffered position, and retained it until his death with great and increasing reputation. In this journal he gave to the world the results of the geological investigations to which his mind had first been directed when the specimens were literally sub oculis manibusque of the quarryman, whose mind was as hard at work as the muscles exercised in his daily labour. These scientific papers elicited the commendation of Sir Charles Lyell, Sir Roderick Murchison, and Dr. Buckland, and the author was encouraged to continue his researches and to communicate the results of his observations to the public. With what success this has been done is well known to the world. Mr. Miller's publications have appeared in the following order: I. A volume of Poems, already noticed. Buckland remarked that "he had never been so much astonished in his life by the powers of any man as he had been by the geological descriptions of Mr. Miller, which had been shown to him in the Witness newspaper by his friend Sir C. That wonderful man described these objects with a felicity which made him ashamed of the comparative meagreness and poverty of his own descriptions, which sad coat him hours and days of labour. . . . He would give his "ft hand to possess such powers of illustration as this man; and, if it pleased Providence to spare his useful life, he, if any one, would certainly render science attractive and popular and do equal service to theology and geology."

To which are prefixed Memorials of the Author, embracing an Authentic and Minute Account of his Death, &c., Edin. and Bost., 1857, 12mo. The melancholy circumstance which made memorable the night immediately succeeding the completion of this volume is deeply engraved on the minds of all who loved the author and admired his works:

who loved the author and admired his works:

'In the last days [Dec. 24] of 1856," remarks Mr. Bayne, "High Miller died, a self-sacrificed martyr to science. At the great work which was to complete his service to his country and mankind he tolied on with indomirable resolution, and the paraxysms of tearfid disease. His powerful brain, wearied with the sustained tension of twenty years, recolled from its work, and, as it were, groaned and struggled for rest. But that admantine will knew to flinching. Ever, as the paraxysm possed by, and the soft glow of the old genius spread itself again along the mind, the nost intense and intremitted exertion was compelled. The light burnt nightly in his thambar, long after the midnight hour, as Hugh Miller continued to write, the body failing, the nerves funtering, the brain attil held to its work only by that indomitable will. He feared madness might dash the pen from his hand before the last line was traced. But the work was finished. On the last day of his life High Miller said it was done. Madness and the grave could not deprive him of that. Then, as might have been expected, despite commitation with a physician, the paraxysm returned with redoubled fury; ere it again subsided. Hugh Miller was no more."

—Bayne's Essays in Biography and Criticien, First Series: Hugh Miller, Boat, 1857, 361-302.

The said tale is thus briefly told by a journal of the day:

The sad tale is thus briefly told by a journal of the day: "THE DEATH OF HUGH MILLER.

"A post-mortem examination of the body of Hugh Miller was made at his house in Portobello, on Friday, by Professor Miller and other medical gentlemen. The following is the quadratic translation of the professor of the conclusion to and other ruedical gentlemen. Are rouse might which they have come:

"The name of death we found to be a pistol-shot through the left side of the clost, and this we are satisfied was inflicted by his own hand. From the diseased appearances found in the brain, takes in connexion with the history of the case, we have no doubt that the not was satisfied. under the impulse of insanity."
"The following few lines to his wife, found written on a folio sheet lying on the table beside his corpse, give painful evidence of the awful insanity of the disease:

"Dearest Lydia,—My brain burns. I must have peaked; and a fearful dream arises upon me. I cannot bear the horrible thought. God and Father of the Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon me. Deurest Lydia, dear children, farewell. My brain burns as the recollection grows.

Ny dear, dear wife, farewell.

"Hugh Miller."

The publication of the work for which the world paid so "dear a price" has been so recent that but little op-portunity for deliberative criticism has been afforded. We are able, however, to quote a few lines of "testimony" to the merits of The Testimony of the Rocks:

the merits of The Teafimony of the Rocks:
"This work is too well known and fully appreciated to require remark in this place. We wish it may be universally read, as the last message of one who knew by experience the profound truths and harmofies of the two revelations,—the testimony of the rocks and of the written word. The title-page presents the theme of the work in a sentence from Job; Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field."—Sillman's Amer. Jour. of Science, July, 1877.

"The purpose of the book is to show that geology tends no more than astronomy has tended to the overthrow of a just faith in natural and revealed religion. . . From our brief sketch of the contents of this book it may be seen that it has an interest of its own, which would have claimed for it a large share of public attention even had there been only us contents to command curiosity concerning it "-Lon. Examiner.

"We cannot close these jages without the deep feeling of regret that the vigorous hand and brave intellect that are so conspicuous in every page should have so suddenly and painfully ceased to work. We comment the book as a fitting memoral of the mind of a man reparkable for his self-culture, literary ability, accurate science, and manly assertion of his convictions of the truth."—Lon. Athen, 1867, 431.

"As a contribintion to science, and as a clear and calm statement of fixed lacts, verified by personal observation, it is, like all of Mr.

"As a contribution to science, and as a clear and calm statement of fixed facts, verthed by personal observation, it is, like all of Mr. Miller's works, of great value and attractiveness. . . . In none of his works does the peculiar charm of his genum manifest itself more forcibly; in none has he nore successfully united keen scientific analysis, and the lucul arrangement of data which satisfy the demands of the student, with the graces of skyle which delight the general reader, to whom, of course, much of his technical phrascology must be unintelligible."--N Amer. Rec., Jan. 1858, 172.

We adduce another American "testimony"

we addite another American "restingury:
"The Tectimony of the Rocks' has met with a certial reception here, among scientific readers, for its able contributions to geology; among the religious, on account of its illustration of Biblical history; and among all capable of appreciating original character, for its cloquent expositions fresh aspects of truth, and the melancholy
TROCKERAN, New YOR Aprel 30, 1887. T. TUCKERMAN, New York, April 30, 1857.

We may add to the above that all of Miller's geological works enjoy great popularity in America. A new and uniform edit. (5 vols. 12mo) has been recently (1857) issued by Messrs. Gould & Lincoln, of Boston, and another collective edition, several times referred to in this article, is now in course of publication by Constable & Co., of Edinburgh. The Boston ed. is composed of Nos. 3, 5, 7,

Since the above was written, there has been announced April, 1858) Posthumous Works of Hugh Miller: Volume First, embracing The Cruise of the Betsey; or. A Summer Ramble among the Fossiliferous Deposits of the Hebrides. With Rambles of a Geologist; or. Ten Thousund Miles over the Fossiliferous Deposits of Scotland. This series, to be pub. simultaneously at Edinburgh and Boston, and to appear under the superintendence of the author's widow, will consist of articles contributed to periodicals and of unpublished MSS. left by the author at his death.

Within the last few weeks has appeared Labour and Triumph: The Life and Times of Hugh Miller, by Thomas N. Brown, D.D., Glasgow and N. York, 1858, 12mo. N. Brown, D.D., Glasgow and N. York, 1858, 12mo. The London Literary Gazette describes this book as only a reg on which to hang the history of the "Free-Church movement in Scotland," and as "written in that intolerably inflated style which finds favour north of the Tweed," "Throughout the book," it adds, "the incidents of Hugh Miller's life bear a secondary place." Another authority styles it "merely a criticism,—biography with no authority." Mr. H. T. Tuckerman speaks of the book in more favourable terms. It is understand that Mr. Miller's sucfavourable terms. It is understood that Mr. Miller's suc-Bayne, favourably known by his Christian Life, Social and Individual, and his Essays in Biography and Criticism, will soon give to the world a biographical account of one

"A Scottish nobleman." remarks the Landon Athenseum, "has offered 1000L for, the museum collected by the late lingh Miller: an American college has offered 1000 guiness. The family of the geologist wish to feelize their property, and the sale cannot be deforred. A meeting of Scotch gentlemen interested in accurace and education has therefore been held in Edinburgh, [April 12, 1868,] and a committee named to collect subscriptions with a view to purchase the collection for permanent location in a Scotch museum. We suppose the sum required will be at once raised. England has done its part. The late Government fortion in the present Government will doubtless carry out the intention of their predecessors. Scotland will of course, do the rest: Indeed, we trust that the funds are already affect."—April 23, 1868.

We have quoted some glowing eulogies of the literary merits of Hugh Miller; but, with so many more still unquoted before us, we find it difficult to close an article already sufficiently extended.

"The works of Hugh Miller have excited the greatest interest, not only among scientific men, but also among general readers. There is in them a freshness of conception, a power of argumentation, a depth of thought, and a punty of feeling, rarely met with in works of such character, which are well calculated to call lottly hympathy, and to increase the popularity of a science which has already done so much to expand our views of the plan of creation. The scientific illustrations published by Mr. Miller are most happily combined with considerations of a chiquer order, rendering both equally acceptable to the thinking reader. But what is in a great degree peculiar to our author is the successful combination of Christian dectrines with pure scientific truth,"—Propriseon Adassiz: Introduc, to Amer, ed. of Fiodprints of the Creator.

"Among the eminent students of the structure of the earth, Mr. Hugh Miller holds a lofty place, not merely from the discovery of new and undescribed organisms in the Old Red Sandstone, but from the accuracy and beauty of his descriptions, the parity and elegance of his compositions, and the high tone of philosophy and religion which distinguishes all his writings. . . With the exception of Burns, the unclusted genius which has done honour to Scotland during the last century has never displayed that mental refinement and classical taste and intellectual energy which mark all the writings of our author"—Six Devio Brakwster, Ll.D., F.B.8.

"He succeeded in placing his name in the first read of the light of the structure of the careful of the mental of the name of the light of the mental classical taste. "The works of Hugh Miller have excited the greatest interest, mark all the writings of our author "—Sir David Brewster, Ll.D., F.R.S."

"He succeeded in placing his name in the first rank of British scientific writers and thinkers. His weeks are characterized by a fine union of strict science, class: detion, and eachanting description, which rises not unit quently into the lottest vein of poetry."

—Rey. William Hanna, Ll.D.

"Dr. Chainers," remarks his son in-law, Dr. Hanna, "repeatedly said, after the death of Sir Walter Scott, that Hugh Miller was the greatest Scotchman alive."

"One of the most original writers of this age,"—Rey. Allert Barnes: Essays and Receives, 1855 ii. 346.

"We have read the books and the articles of Mr. Hugh Miller with great admiration. He has a fluent and graceful style,—a good command of language,—a genuine acquaintance with external nature. We, who skipped the geology in them, had nevertheless great pleasure in his books; and when a scintific work interests an unscientific reader the fact is a considerable testamony to its powers. . . The frivent style and glowing language of the dreamer [in his retrospective geological speculations) banch our imagination into a kindred enthusiann. —Hackw. Mag., Aug. 1855; Madern Loght Laterature: Science.

"Not one of the authors of our day has approached Hugh Miller as a master of English composition for the equal of which we must go back to the times of Addison, Hume, and Gold-mith. Other living writers have won a wider celebrity, but they owe it much to the peculiarity of their topics. Mr. Miller has taken subjects of science too often rendered dry and repulsive, and has thrown over them the air of an attractive remance. . . . Literature and science have lost in him one of their brightest ornaments, and Scotland one of its greatest men."—Lon. 2tt. Care.

On his style it were not easy to confer too high praise. Dr. Buckland did not scruple to inform the world that he would give his left hand to possess such powers of description as Hugh Miller. Recollecting the staid and prosaic habits of professors, we cannot but feel that Dr. Buckland must have been very much struck indeed. The style in question is one of very rare excellence. Easy, fluent, and expressive, it adapts itself, like a silken shawl, to every swell and motion and curve of a subject. It is graphic yet not extravagant, strong without vociferation, measured without formality, classically chaste yet 'pleasingly adorned. It has the soft flow and easy cadence which narked the best distinctive style of the eighteenth century, stubborned with semething of the sterner music of the nineteenth. Such a style belongs only to men of genius. Rich, lucid, pictorial, it casts fascination over the old armour of the pterichthys, or shows a whole geographical district at one view, the physiognomic features strongly brought out and the whole robod in a beauty at once poeth and scientific."—Royne's Easys in Biography and Criticius: Hugh Miller, 333-339.

"Hugh Miller's First Impressions of England and its People, The Old Red Fandstone, or New Walks in an Old Field, and Footpints of the Creator, are remarkable works of a remarkable man is atone-quarrier in Scotland) whose fevent and observing mind, and reverset yet bold and inquiring spirit, and admirable self-sultare under saverse circumstances, have raised him to the highest rank among geologists and cloquent writers."—President King, of Columbia College: Kent's Course of English Reading, Oakley's ed., 1853, 116.

"Probably no other scientific writer numbers one-half so many unscientific readers as Mr. Miller. His manner is marked by nativel without offensive egotism, except where his enthusiasm rises without effort into higher cloqueines... Mr. Miller possessed, to a degree perhaps hover surpassed, that rare power of vision which can adapt itself equally well to the vast and the minute, the distant sud the funcelate,—can see at the same moment the creation of a world and the unfolding of the flower-bud,"

The annals of literature present few instances of a man at ones so gifted and so deserving, so situated and so successful; combining so much intellectual bone, muscle, and sinew with exquisite sensibility, a heart so strong, so tender, and so myright, and a soul sy genuine, genual, and devout. And had he been content with a moderate amount of literary exertion, had be carefully observed those laws of the physical economy which, however held in abeyance for a time, will sooner or later vindicate their authority to the cost of the unwise transgressor, in this abode of peace, plenty, and scientific research he might still have lived and laboured to the continued benefit of his follow-men and to the undying glory of his own great name.

Miller, Joseph, 1684-1738, a man who, like many others less famous, has enjoyed a great reputation for wit which he never deserved, was noted for his excellent personations on the stage of some of the principal characters in Congreve's comedies. The Jest-Book which has conferred cembrity upon his name was originally pub. in 1739, 8vo, as the compilation of his friend Elijah Jenkins; but the real editor (and author, it is asserted) was John Mottley, the author of the Life of Peter the Great. There were three eds. of Joe Miller's Jests, or The Wit's Vade Mecum, in 1739, all Svo; a 6th in 1743, and another in 1747, 8vo. We also notice (2) Old Joe Miller: being a Complete and Correct Copy from the best edition of his celebrated Jests; and also including all the Good Things in above 50 Jest-Books published from the Year 1551 to the present time, by the editor of the New Joe Miller, [James Bannatine,] Lon., 1800, 12mo. 3. "Dr. Miller has a happy talent for the composition of a book. His method, though running out too much into detail, is very perspicuous. His style is marked by an elegant simplicity, and is always intelligible. Generally flowing with the casy sweetness of Doddridge, Newton, and that class of writers on experimental religion, it occasionally rises to the more artificial, condensed, and elevated strain of Hannah More."—Rev. S. Gimman, D. P. Review of Clerical Manners and Habits: N. Amer. Rev., xxvin. 303-321.

Miller came from the training of city-life, and from an eminently polished and literary circle. Of fine person and courtly manners, he set a high value on all that makes society dignified and attractive. He was pre-eminently a man of system and method, governing himself, even in the minutest particulars, by axact rule. His daily exercise was measured to the moment; and for half a century he wrote standing. He was a gentleman of the old school, though as easy as he was noble in his bearing,—full of couver-sation, brilliant in company, rich in anecdote, and universally admired. As a preacher, he was clear without brilliancy, accustomed to laborious and critical preparation, relying little on the socitement of the occusion, but rapid with his peu, and gifted with a tenacious memory and a strong, sonorous voice, always instructive, always caim, always accurate. —Life of Archibald Alasander, D.D., by his son, James IV. Mr. Miller appears to be a sensible man, judging from

Miller, William Allen, M.D., b. Dec. 17, 1817, at Ipswich, Suffolk, Demonstrator of Chemistry in King's College, London, 1840, and Professor of Chemistry in the same institution, 1845, has furnished some scientific papers to the British Association, Phil. Trans., and Phil. Mag., and is the author of the following work: Elements of Chemistry Theoretical and Practical: Part I. Chemical Physics, 1855, Svo; Part II. Inorganic Chemistry, 1856, Physics, 1855, 8v6; Part II. Inorganic Chemistry, 1856, 8v6.

"The author's mind appears to be well stored with the facts of his science, but his classifications and explanations are not advays so happy as we could wish them to be; and the reason, we imagine, is because he suffers himself to be guided by what he has read, and does not seem accustomed to trust his own independent thought on chemical subjects."—Wishn. Rev., Apill, 1856; notice of Part II.

Part III. Organic Chemistry, 1857, 8vo.

"The completion of Professor Miller's comprehensive and well-digested treatise in Chemistry, by the publication of the volume devoted to the organic division of the science, will be welcomed as a valuable boon by all such students as desire a wider range of information than the smaller tox-books afford. Without being distinguished by any particular originality, either in general plan or in details his work is embendly characterized by the judgment, in the selection and skill in grouping of its untertials, which mark the clear thinker and the experienced teacher; and those are qualities of first-rate importance to the construction of a good textbook."—Witten. London, the youngest son of the proceding, and brother to Sir William George Milman, was educated at Eton College and at Brazennose College, Oxford, received the Newdogate prize for his English poem on the Belvidere Apollo in 1812, and became Fellow of Brazennose in 1815. In 1817 he took holy orders and was appointed Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading; was elected Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford in 1821; subsequently became Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and a Canon of Westminof St. Margarets, westminster, and a chain of vestmin-ster; and in 1849 was made Dean of St. Paul's. 1. Blanca. A criticism upon it, as first represented, will be found in Blackwood's Magazine, March, 1818, 667-669,—Notices of the Acted Drama in London.

"We have some difficulty," remarks the critic, "in speaking of this tragedy. If we compare it with the crowd of werethed nothings that have reigned paramount in our national theatres for these ten years past, we shall never have done praising it; but if we judge of it as of what it professes to be,—'an attempt at reviving our old national drama,'—we shall never have done finding fault. Indeed, this attempt to revive the old drama has been the author's stumbling-block all through. He has powers that would have embled him to construct a fine tragedy if he had chosen to rely on them; but when he betrays a want of confidence in them he must not wonder at their deserting him."—if. 667, q, r.

"Milman's Faxio is affecting; at least the O'Neil made it so; but it is little more than an ingenious and powerful imitation of the old drama by a man of fine tailors and high accomplishments, and as such should be read."—Ibid. xxxix.267.

"He is far too foul of the superlative degree: scarcely a simile or an epithet is used which does not throw into an extreme that to which it is applied. . . . His plot is a bad one, and he might, with attie trouble, have amended it; but he has preferred the merit of conducting a bad plot with some ingenuity: his characters are feeble and unamiable, and he might have easily made them less so; but he has preferred the task of intercetting us in them as they are. And, with all their faults. Faxio and flames do interest us. . . . But we have a much more agreeable task to perform,—the noticing of beauties which no faults can obscure,—and to that we now gladly address ourselves. . . . Mr. Milman must see by the extent of our remarks the value which we set upon his performance: we have examined his prefensions to public favour with perfect impartiality: it has been sometimes our duty to censure, but more frequently it has been our graveful task to exp cultivation angus rapporturing and supporturing the power of inventing and supthining character; but the language certainly strikes us as even more forced and pedantic than we had originally conceived it to be, . . . With the exception than

of the singularly stiff and socials scene of Fazio and his flattwest, we think that the author's spirit scarcely ever flags through the drains. He dances, in fact, most vigorously in his fetters: "shap would he have done had he been wholly free? If his spirit be of the right order, it would have been greatly augmented in energy,". We regret, then, that this gentleman, gifted as he evideusly, is with no ordinary faculties and accomplishments as a poet, did not rely more on his original powers and leason any chosen models of composition, however excellent in their own sers." "After so much censure, it would be idle to pronounce sentence of unqualified approbation; but we thank Mr. Milman sincerely for much pleasure. There is scarcely a page of the book which does not testify that he is a poet of no ordinary powers. Every one of them exhibits some beautiful expression, some pathetic turn, some original thought, or some striking image. . . . When Milman was last before us |vol. xv. 69-85, supra| west mot slow to bestow upon him the praise which he did indeed the samply merit, but we then remarked on the faults of his style. Poets perhaps feel a pride in rejecting the admonitions of critics; and Mr. Milman has exceeded himself on the present occasion in the exuberant detects of his own manner. We desire not to be considered as exaggerating our expressions beyond our sober convictions, or merely framing a pointed period, when we say that in this respect Samor exhibits all that is affected in laftynage, strange even to solecism in usage, involved in construction, and meretricious in ornament. We have really sometimes been at a loss how to extricate the commonest idea from the labyrinth of words in which it is lost." Los. Quar. Rev., xix. 328-347.

"Ho is a fine young man, and his powers are vory great. They are, however, better fitted for the drama than for narration: the drama admits his favourite stram of composition, and is easier in its structure. Indeed, it is as much easier to plan a play than a pown of such magnitude as Samor, as it is to build a gentleman's house than a cathedal. . With less poetry, Samor would have been a letter poem. . . "His poems are fine examples of sound intellect and cultivated taste; but we look in van through them for evidence of inventiva power and originality of thought. He has little skill in mastering the heart or controlling the feelings."—Mr. Hats.
"We are always impressed with a conviction of his learning, his ability, and his cultivated taste, but are haunted at the same time with an unsatisfactory feeling that his poetry is rather a clever recasting of fine things aircady fauntiar to us than strikingly fresh and original. . . With lees leaning to authorities, and greater-cliance on his own powers and impressions, there can be no doubt that Milman would have written far finer postry and secured a more extended acceptability; for his more simple strains are, after all, those best remembered, and he could be at times allke matural and pathetic."—More's Post Liu, dee, 182.

The limitations are executed with a fidelity and grace not often so well conveyed in such minute forms; and they have the great charm of appropriateness. They come when they are wanted. Often they light up hints and allusions in the text which without them would be obscare. Usages are explained by their means, descriptions of scenery made more vivid, pulse or abuse made matter of nare; personal interest, and satirfied expressions accounted for by touches of Roman info and manners, never so quickly and sharply recognisable as in such a series of graphic outlines. "Of the editor of this eminently beautiful and splendid edition of the works of Horace it is almost superfluous for us to speak. Dean Milman, as a spect, an historian, and a critic, has already sarned for himself a station in literature which no commendation of ours would render more certain or compluous. His Life of Horace is, of course, not a performance which can add much to his literary fame. To a scholar so accomplished, and to as experienced a writer, it was probably the work of leisure hours. It is, however, both well written and—what with such a subject is of essential importance—gracefully and gentally conceived, and should be taken into account by every subsequent editor of the Roman Lyrist."—Ritin. ind a wide difference of opinion expressed:

"The Milners were no ordinary men. Their pure and elevated standard of scriptural truth, their discrimination and acuteness of judgment, their bold avowal of Christian doctrine, their disregard of the passing taste of the times, their originality and independence of mind, their knowledge of the human heart, their thorough anderstanding of their subject, . . . their combination, in short, of great qualities, both natural and acquired, have placed their volumes very high in the rank of religious productions."—Bruno Wilson, of Calcutta.

"Milner will ever be valued by the Christian mind for his History of the Church of Christ,—an inestimable treasure of evangelical truth and Christian experience, continuing the History of the Church of Christ, in the very spirit of the sacred writes, as far as human infirmity can tread in their steps. . . A work emisently plous and useful, having much of the mind of the Spirit.

The best history of the real Church, and ably continued, [by Isaac Milner,] . . . In his Reflections on Ecclesiastical Establishments [in vol. ii. of his History] he speaks with much power of mind and good sense on a difficult subject."—Buckerstell's C. N., 4th ed., 320, 428, 500.

"If Mosheim's Ecclosiastical History have been, a little too epigrammatically, styled the History of Sinners, that of the late Dr. Milner has been as concisely called the History of Sounts. But the latter is a learned and valuable work, dashed though it may be with some little spice of Calviniam. The chapter on Religious Establishments (I think its under the reign of Theodosius) has been mentioned to me as admirable. And the work has many particulars relating to our Reformation in which Mosheim is almost necessarily deficient. I cannot, therefore, dispense with the possession of this spiritedly-executed performance."—Diddin's Lib. Comp., ed. 1825, 128.

"A work like Milner's is still worse and more useless than Moshein's . . . simply because he was a man of feeble powers and Imited views . . . This book, which has no intrinsic value, will sink totally into merited neglect."—Hugh James Rose's Terminal Divinity Lect. before the Univ. of Durham.

"To his 'History of the Church' we have often referred in these volumes, [Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary,] as it appears to us of more anthority in many respects than that of Mosheim; and, whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the view Mr. Milnor takes of the progress of religion, he appears to have read more and penetrated deeper into the history, principles, and writings of the fathers and reformers than any preceding English historian."—Chalmers's Diag. Dict., xxii. 177.

"Of the two most popular compilers of church-history, Mosheim gives the more husk of history; Milner, nothing but some separated particles of pure farina."—Isaac Taylos, author of Natural Histor Enthusiasm.

Hist, of Enthusiasm.

"I would take this opportunity of observing that they who have seen cause to regret that the History of Mosheim presents rather an external than an internal view of the Church of Christ, and who perceive that the pious Milner did not altogether possess the extent of information or the freedom from party spirit requisite to his undertaking, will find in the History of Weismann both the picty of the latter and the historical fulness and accuracy of the former."—Compleare's Bampton Lect.

Of course the theological student must secure C. E. Welsmann's Historia Ecclesiastica, edita optima, revisa, emendata et aucta, Hale, 1745, 2 vols. 4to. "Milnor, estimable as he was for his piety, produced a work which merely proved how strangely he was destitute of the in-dermation most indispensable to the ecclesiastical historian."— Rev. John G. Dowling.

The British Critic for 1835 remarks of Dr. R. S. Maitland's Second Letter to the Rev. II. J. Rose, containing Notes on Milner's History of the Church in the Fourth

"It seems to settle forever the pretensions of Milner as a segreiner into original authorities, whatever may be the merits or demerits of his work in other respects."

"I must mention, before I conclude, the last two volumes of Dean Milner's Ecclesiastical History. They are written, like the primelyal part of the work, by his brother, upon a particular system of doctrine; but with this, as a locturer of history. I have no concern. The reason for which it is necessary that I should recommend them to your attention is this; that they contain, particularly in the life of Luther, the best account I know of the more intellectual part of the history of the Reformation; in other words, they contain the progress of the Reformation in Luther's own mind.—a very outloos subject. Such were the great tolents and qualities of Luther, and such was the situation of Europe at the time, that the Reformation, in such that the the sund of the other. I therefore consider these 1984s.

two volumes, particularly in the lives of Wick-life- and Luther, as a most entertaining and valuable accession to our general stock of information, and one that may be considered as accessible to every student. Dr. Milner appears to me too determined, a panegyrist of Luther. This, however, may be forgiven him; not to say that it becomes me to speak with diffidence, when I speak to differ from one whom I know to have been able and whom I conceive to have been so diligent."—Prof. Smyth's Lects. on Modern Hitl, Lect. X.

"Milner, who is extremely partial in the whole of this history; ithe Reformation under Luther.] labours to extenuate the claims of Zwingle to independence in the preaching of reformation.

The prejudice of Milner against Zwingle throughout is striking, and leads him into much unfairness. ... Milner's every profix history of this period is rendered less valuable by his distingenuous trick of suppressing all passages in these treatiess of Luther which display his antinomian paradoxes in a strong light. Whoever has read the writings of Luther up to the year 1520 inclusive must find it impossible to contradict my assertion. In treating of an author so full of unlimited propositions as Luther, no positive proof as to his tenets can be refuted by the production of inconsistent passages."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, i. 235. n., 238. n., q.c.

With a commendatory notice, from the same periodical, of the last ed., (Lon., 1847, 4 vols. 8vo,) we close our record of clashing opinions upon this important work:

record of clashing opinions upon this important work:

"Of Milner's Church History it is quite unnecessary to say any thm; in the present day, as its merits have been fully discussed, at data reputation for the purpose for which it was intended fully established. It was written at a time when but little attention had been given to the study of ecclesiastical history in this country, and consequently shows less learned research than, under other circumstances, might have been expected. But for the great purpose for which it was intended—i.e. as a history of the progress of true religion—its value is great. And several of the deficiences observed in previous editions have been supplied in the new, accurate, and well-executed edition noticed at the head of this article. Mr. Grantham has carculity verified all the references, (which were given somewhat loosely before.) and so increased their number as to leave few important facts or statements without a notice of the authority on which they rest. He has also corrected all the errors which either he himself has discovered or which had been pointed out by others. In short, the work has been very diligently revised, and the edition, we can give to these volumes our cordial recommendation." reflect credit upon the editor. cordial recommendation."

and exhibiting the gospel of Christ as a sovereign remedy for both. . . . They are plain and artiess, but carnest and powerful, discourses, such as John Bradford, Hugh Latimer, or Edwin Sandys would have delivered to their congregations; and the doctrines are exactly those of our reformers from Popery. Indeed, we have often been reminded of honest Latimer in perusing these sermons of Mr. Milner, and been carried back in imagination to the test and purest times of the Church of England, when all her bishops and clergy preached according to her Articles and Homilies."

"His poetry, while possessing unusual merits of a certain kind, is yet defective and ineffectual from the want of the poetic soul. It wants impulse and glow. It is elaborate, elegant, stately, and sonorous in form and movement, generous, moral, and devout in sentiment, bearing with it an air of philosophical pretension and shaded by a gentle touch of melancholy. "His poetry is the poetry of reflection, and not of passion, and is a transcript of trains of thought rather than of moods of feeling; nor does if abound with the element of the purity picturesque. It commends itself by a certain thoughtful elegance, a pure and corivet tone of feeling, a delicate spirit of observation, and a scholarlike grace of style. To the endowments of a great post, that life-giving breath of inspiration, the cicative power of genius, that, soars into the highest heaven of invention, and subdues, meits, and moulds the heart at will, he can hardly lay claim; but he may justly aspire to no mean rank among those poets whose aim it has been to make men wiser and happier by their thoughts and affections, who have drawn 'that wisdom which is love' from the many-colored scenes of life, and who have found the seeds of poetry springing up in the furrows of the common heart and mind. He is fully as much of a philosopher as of a poet; and the interest and value of his poetry are devived as much from the thoughful spirit which breathes through it as from the more strictly poetical element. Nor does he escape the facilist to which poetry of this class is exposed. He is sometimes tame and monotoous, dwelling too much upon particulars and details, and giving to his subject an injudicious expansion; and sometimes he clothes in the four and body of verse what is essentially pressue, and what by no change of garb can be made otherwise."—Goo Stillman Hillard: N. "The poerry of Richard Monekton Milnes," renarks a fellow-contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, "possesses very considerable elegance and faste, a philosophic sentiment, and a graceful tenderness, but is deficient in individuality and power, although perhaps not so much so as might at first seem; for, as in Henry Taylor's, the grand pervading element is repose; his sunset has no clouds, and his morning no breezes. From his lack of constructiveness and dramatic pussion, he appears to most advantage in his sortions, his sentimental and descriptive sketches, many of which are fine and striking, although he often mars the general effect by unnecessary analysis. He may be said to have followed more in the wake of Wordsworth than of any other preceding poet, although his admiration for Keats and Shelley is not unseldom apparent. His narrative is wanting in rapidity and action, and is apt to fall into a fleading monotony and languor. from which we are not roused by salient points: the current of his thoughts would be vivilind by more frequent breaks and waterfalls. Hence his 'Poetry for the People' was a mismomer; for, instead of being circumstantial and palpable, it was abstract, and beyond the 'reach of their sympathies. one of the most illustrious of his race for genius, philanthripy, learning, and virtue, was the son of John Milton, of Bread Street, London, a respectable citizen who devoted the hours of business to his office-engagements as a serivener and amused his leisure in the evenings by comparing good music of his leisure in the evenings by composing good music and bad verses. Those who desire to be gratified by the first can turn to Morley's Oriana, 1601, Sir William Leighton's Tears of a Sorrowful Soul, 1614, and Slayter's Psalms, 1643; and all who imagine that they will be able to endure the latter may refer to the Harleian MSS. 6423, in the British Museum, or to Mr. Hunter's printed specimen in his Critical and Historical Tracts, No. 3, for June, 1850. Mr. Todd, indeed, imputes this precious morcean to John Melton, the author of the Astrologaster, and, on the other hand, Warton and others oredit to the worthy scrivener John Melton's volume entitled The Sixe-folde Politician, 1609, 12mo; but, as we ave observed in our notice of the latter on a preceding playe observed in our notice of the latter on a preceding page, Hayley, Farmer, and Reed (no contemptible trio) hare of another opinion. Mr. funter is disposed to question the truth of the generally-bodyed statement that the poor's grandfuther (also named John Milton) enjoyed the post of under-ranger; nor does no believe that the rebellions son who so deeply offended him by turning Protestant resided, even for a brief period, min by laying Processes resided, even for a brief period, by the classic shades of Christ Church, Oxford. unsettled biographical minutize it is manifest there is no end; and if we were obliged in this Dictionary to emulate the scrupulous accuracy of the Heralds' College, and present each of our authors to the reader clothed in an unimpeachable coat of arms before we were permitted to speak of his literary productions, neither our reader's patience on our own pages would be equal to the undertaking. It was in his father's house in Bread Street, London, that the infant Milton first saw that light which no uninspired muse has ever celebrated in strains more majestic, and the loss of which was never deplored in pathos more subline, or more affecting. The "price" paid for such touching eloquence was indeed "too high;" we would that the profixpring of Hoaven first born" should have daily "revisited those eyes;" but we rejoice at the might of that imperial genius which could make even the kingdom of darkness tributary to its irresistible sway. After a preparatory course in the humanities, under the careful eye of Dr. Thomas Young, a Puritan divine of Essex, young Milton was placed at St. Paul's School, then presided over by the learned Dr. Gill; and on the 12th of February, 1024, he was entered of Christ's College, Cambridge, where he seems to have woodd the muses and cultivated the classics with equal success. The paraphrases of the 114th and 136th Psalms were written about the time of his entering college; in the next year, 1625, he wrote the beautiful poem entitled On the Death of a Fair Infant dying of a Cough; and this carly period of his life was marked by many other indications of that poetical genius which was destined to confer such enduring honours on his name, his language, and his native country. From his early youth it had been settled that the thoughtful child who pursued knowledge with such unwearied avidity, and who always seemed by the sanctity of his opening years to have been set apart for holy purposes from the common herd of men, should assume orders upon his arriving at a suitable age; should assume orders upon ms arriving as a suitable age; but this purpose was never carried out.

"By the intention of my parents and friends," he tells us. "I was destined, of a child, to the service of the Church, and in mine own resolutions. Till, coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyramy had invaded the Church, and that he who would take orders must subscribe Slave, and take an oath with all which, unless he took, with a conselence that he would retch, he must either straight perjure, or split his faith. I thought better to prefer a blameless silence before the sacred office of speaking bouchs and hearm with servitude and forswearing."

Again he tells us, "My father sent me to Cambridge. There I devoted myself for the space of seven years to the literature and arts usually saught, free from all reproach and approved of by all good men, as far as the degree of Master, as it is termed."

Upon his leaving college in 1632, Milton, now in the twenty-fourth year of his age, removed to his father's house in Horton, Buckinghamshire, and during this happy period of his life (1632 to '37) he composed his Arcades, Comus, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, Lycidas, and probably his Latin poem Ad Patrem. He seems now to have abandoned all thoughts of the profession of the law, which he had doubtless seriously meditated. On the 3d of April, 1637, Milton lost that affectionate mother to whose credit he has recorded this honourable character: "Mater probatissima et elcomo-synis per vicinium potissimum nota," (Defensio Segunda.) It was natural that, whilst suffering under this great grief, —"going heavily," to use the expressive language of the Psalmist, "like him who mourneth for his mother,"—he should seek in a change of scene to assuage the bitterness of that woo which the sight of each familiar object tended to perpetuate and to increase.

"My father gave me his permission." he remarks, (in his Defination Secunda) "and I left home with one servant. On my departure, the celebrated Henry Woodon, who had bong been King James's ambassador at Venice, gave me a signal proof of his regard, in an elegant letter which he wrote, breathing not only the warmest friendship, but contribute new restrants of conduct which I test in an elegant letter which he wrote, breathing not only the warnest friendship, but containing some maxims of conduct which I tound very useful in my travels. The noble Thomas Scudamore, King Charles's ambassador, to whom I carried letters of recommendation, received me most courteously at Paris. His lordship gave me a card of introduction to the learned Hugo Grotius, at that time ambassador from the Queen of Sweden to the French court. A few days after, when I set out for Italy, be gave me letters to the English merchants on my route, that they might show me any civilities in their power." civilities in their power complished Englishman that ever visited her classical shores," says one of his enthusiastic admirers.

"Taking ship at Nice," remarks the delighted traveller, "I strivet at Genoa, and afterwards visited Leghorn, Pisa, and Florence, In the latter city, which I have always more particularly estreptical for the clegance of its dialect, its genius, and its tasts. I stopped about two months: when I contracted an intimacy with many persons of rank and learning, and was a constant attendant as their literary parties.—a practice which prevails there and trads so much to the diffusion of knowledge and the preservation of friendship. From Florence I went to Blenna, thence to Roma.

where after I had spent about two months in viewing the antiquities of that renowned city.—I experienced the most friendly attentions from Lucas Holstein and other learned and ingenious men.—I continued my route to Naples."
The young Englishman was not so exclusively engrossed with the "antiquities of the renowned city" as to be intended to unoverted and an accomplishment of hearty; and it is sensible to more modern specimens of beauty; and it is certain that he was so greatly pleased with the singing of the celebrated Leonora Baroni—whom he heard at Carthe celebrated becomes Baroni—whom he hears at a dingle Barberini's, and probably at other places—that he addressed to her three Latin epigrams, the highest price per yet paid for the dulect notes of "singing-men and singing-women" since the days of Jubal, the "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." But, whilst not singing women" since the days of Jubal, the "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." But, whilst not anwilling thus to beguile his "hours of ease" with the blandishments of polite society, that stern sense of responsibility for all his actions which made him live "As ever in his great Task-Master's eye" would not permit him to hold his peace whilst surrounded with so much which be conceived to be detrimental to those important interests which lay nearest to his heart.

those important interests which lay nearest to his heart.

"Whilst I was on my way back to Rome," (from Naples,) he tells us, "some merchants informed me that the English Jesuits had formed a plot against me if I returned to Rome, because I had spoken too freely of religion; for it was a rule which I hald down to myself in those places, never to be the first to begin any conversation on religion, but, if any questions were put to me concerning my faith, to declare it without any reserve or fear. I nevertheless returned to Rome. I took no steps to conceal either my person or my character, and, for about the space of two months, I again openly detended, as I had done before, the Reformed religion in the very metropolis of Popery."

That this unusual zeal was not dictated by the control

That this unusual zeal was not dictated by the controversial spirit of the mere logomachist, who gives a wider license to his practice than he allows to his creed, we have evidence sufficient, we think, to satisfy any candid mind, in the words of the traveller himself, who calls

"The Delty to wires that, in all those inlaces in which vice meets with so little discouragement any—w"practised with so little shame, I never once deviated from the paths of integrity and virtue, and perpetually reflected that, though my conduct might escape the notice of men, it would not clude the inspection of God."

We should not force the force of men in the paths of the processing the means of God."

We should not forget to mention that among the distinguished men with whom Milton became acquainted abroad were Galileo, whom he visited in Florence, and John Baptist Manso, Marquis of Villa,—the friend of Tasso,—who accompanied the intelligent stranger in his inspection of the principal curiosities of Naples.

"I experienced from him, as long as I temained there," says Milton, "the most friendly attentions. He accompanied me to the various parts of the city, and took me over the vicercy's palace, and came more than once to my lodgings to visit me. At my departure he made earnest excuses to me for not having been able to show me the further attention he desired in that city, of account of my un-

"The venerable molicinum wrote a Latin distich in our poet's praise, who repaid it by a Latin poem which left far behind any thing written in his honour even by the great Torquato Tasso."— Keightley's Account of the Life, Opinions, and Writings of John Millon, Lon., 1855, 17.

It was whilst at Naples, and before his second visit to Borne intersecured to that Millon received power from Rome just referred to, that Milton received news from home which induced him to abandon his intention of prosecuting his travels:

"When I was preparing to pass over into Sicily and Greece, the melanchedy intelligence which I received of the civil commotions in England made me after my purpose; for I thought it base to be travelling for amosement abroad while my fellow-citizens were fighting for liberty at home."

In August, 1639, after an absence of about fifteen months,

Milton returned to England.

"Things being in such a disturbed and fluctuating state, I looked about to see if I could get any place that would hold myself and my books, and so I took a house of sufficient size in the city; and there, with no small delight, I resumed my intermitted studies,—chiefly leaving the vent of public affairs, first to God, and then to those to whom the people had committed that task."

Milton now occupied himself in the instruction of his people and Edward Phillips and a for reaching the property to the contraction of the people will be a for reaching the contraction of the people will be a for reaching the contraction of the people will be a for reaching the contraction of the people will be a for reaching the contraction of the people will be a for reaching the people will be a for reaching the people will be a for reaching the people will be a for the people w nephews, John and Edward Phillips, and a few more pupils, sons of his intimate friends. At a time of such political excitement it was not to be supposed that so ardent a republican as Milton, and one, too, so capable of appealing in burning words to the hearts of the principal leaders who then divided the nation into two great parties, should long remain elent. In 1641 he gave to the world the first of his polemical treatises,—viz.: Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England, and the Causes that hitherto have hindered it. This argument against the rule of bishops was succeeded, in the same year, by his work on Prelatical Episcopacy, The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty, and some Strictures on a publica-tion of Bishop Hall, and, in 1642, by An Apology for Smectymnuus

But the erudite scholar and learned controversialist was not too much occupied with thus fighting, as he believed, the battles of his country, to be entirely indifferent to those attractions which are so powerful with weaker mortals:

"About Whiteuntide," (of 1643.) says his nophew Phillips, "he took a journey into the country, nobody about him certainly knowing the reason or that it was more than a journey of recreation After a month's stay, he returns a married man who act out a bachelor: his wife being Mary, the eldest daughter of Mr. Richard Powell, then a Justice of the Peace, of Forest Hill, near Shotover's in Oxfordship." in Oxfordshire.

Milton's father-in-law was devotedly attached to the Royal cause, and, of course, surrounded by the civil and occlesiastical influences of his party: it may, therefore, readily be supposed that a member of his household would find little of congenial society at the fireside of the un-q-compromising Puritan. Phillips says that the lady's, family, after due consideration of the great probability of the success of the Royalists,

Began to repent them of having matched the cliest daughter of the family to a person so contrary to them in opinion, and thought that it would be a blot on their escutcheon whenever that court should come to flourish again.

Aubrey tells us that the bride and prought up and bred where there was a great deal of com-pany and merriment, as dancing, &c.; and when she came to live with her husband she found it solitary; no company came to her," &c.

In this state of affairs, we need not be surprised that the fady gladly embraced an invitation—suggested, it is thought, by herself—to spend some time at her father's house. The visit was prolonged to what the husband thought an unreasonable length, and he summoned the truant home. His letters remained unanswered. He then despatched a special incessinger, "who, to the best of my remembrance," says Phillips, "reported that he was dis-missed with some sort of contempt." The indignant husmissed with some sort of contempt." The indiguant hus-band sued no more, but proceeded to repudiate the tair rebel on the grounds of disobedience and descrition; and, in 1641 and '45, he published four tracts in justification of his course,—viz.: 1. The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce; 2. Tetrachordon: or, Exposition of the Four Chief Places in Scripture which treat of The Nullities of Marriage; 3. The Judgment of the famous Martin Bucer touching Divorce; 4. Colasterion. We need hardly say that Milton's arguments, if ten times stronger than they were, would amount to nothing at all so lors as they were opposed to the express law of Scripture. The Divine Founder of Christianity has settled this reatter for all future time; and any alleged divorce which cannot be future time; and any alleged divorce which cannot be justified by his authority is null and vol's, and cannot be, made valid by all the courts of law or begislative enactments of Christendom. It has been ofter said that Milton proved the sincerity of his views in this reatter by paying his addresses to the beautiful Miss Davis, and it is supposed that, had nothing occurred to interrupt his attention, this assumption would be relieved to interrupt his attention. tions, this accomplished woman would I ve been invited to become the second Mrs. Milton. We loubt this, how-We do not believe that a mm so conscientious would have taken a step which if no bertainly rightwhich he could not know it to be- rould be deeply criminal, and which without doubt would have rendered him liable to disgrace, imprisonment, and social contempt. We marvel that Milton's warmest apongists are so willing to admit that he was rapidly prepar ng for his marriage with the fascinating Miss Davis. We rather think that, "being crafty," the sly Puritan caught his truant Royalist bride "by guile." He visited Miss Davis, and probably took care that the late Miss Powell should know where he spent his evenings. The result may readily be imagined. The repentant wife humbled herself at the feet of her repudlating husband, begged to be restored to the home and heart of her deserted lord, and the reconciliation was con plete. This event was a happy one for the P: well family for when the cause of the king grew desperate, and his late adherents were in danger of their lives, Mrs. Milton's connexions sought not in vain a place of refuge in the homes, of the now honoured republican.

In 1644, Milton sent to the press his Tractate on Edg., catlon, and his Arcopagitica, or A Speech for the Liberty, of Unlicensed Printing; and in 1648-49 he gave to the world a work intended as a justification of the trial indexecution of Charles I., entitled The Tenure of Kings and execution of Charles I., entitled The Tenure of Kings and Magistratel; proving that it is lawfull to call Account a Tyrant or Wicked King. This was followed in the same, year by Observations on the Articles of Peace, and Anilladerrions on the Scotch Presbytery at Bellant. He now commenced with much zeal the preparation of a work which he had for some time meditated within a little terest. But he had become too important a man to be a lowed to remain lower secluded in his library.

March, 1649, by the appointment of Secretary of State, (which office he held for eight years,) he was obliged to re-linquish the writing of, for the purpose of acting an import-ant part in, The History of England. His vigorous pen was soon put in requisition by the chiefs of his political party; and, by order of Parliament, he answered the Eikon Basilike by his Eikonoklastes. In 1649, Salmasius gave to the world, in the Latin tongue, his Defensio Regia pro Carolo Primo ad Carolum Secundum. As the literary champion of the republican cause, Milton was expected to do battle with this doughty antagonist; but those who were less heated in the controversy than others repre-mented to him that the loss of his sight would be the cerachied to him that the loss of his sight would be the cer-tain penalty of the continued use of his eyes. "I did not balance," he says, "whether my duty should be preferred to my eyes." He persevered, therefore, in his labours; and at an early date in 1851 he put to press his Latin treatise, Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, contra Claudii Salmatii Defensionem Regiam. This answer was regarded as a great triumph by the republicans and by namy others of the approximate party also. Salmating took his defeat as a great triumph by the republicans and by many others of the opposite party also. Salmasius took his defeat much to heart; and, as he died in the next year, it was alleged that wounded pride had shortened his days. In 1653, Milton followed his wife to her grave; and about this time he became totally blind. (See his Latin Epistles, No. XV.) In 1654, he pub, a reply to Peter du Moulin's Resist Sangarink Change al College de College de Partiel Sangarink Change al College de College de Partiel Sangarink Change al College gil Sanguinis Clamor ad Codum adversus Parricidas Ang-licanas. This response (in which he treated A. More, the publisher of the offensive treatise, as the author of the 🕏 ork) was entitled Defensio Secunda pro Populo Anglicano contra infamen Libellum anonymum cui Titulus Regii Sanguinis Clamor ad Coclum. More took great umbrage at portions of this vigorous protest against his political sentiments and private acts, and replied in his Fides Publica. Milton returned to the charge in his Authoris pro se Defensio in 1655; More attacked this in a Supplementum; and Milton discharged the last gun in his Responsio.

By the death of his wife Milton was left with three daughters,—the eldest about six years of age, and the youngest a few days old. Under these circumstances, we need not be surprised that he looked around for a suitable protector for his children; and in November, 1656, he was again united in the bonds of hely matrimony to Catherine, daughter of Captain Woodcock, of Hackney. In this connexion he seems to have been truly happy, and was a sincere mourner when, in the beginning of February, 1657-58, only fifteen months after the day of his marriage, he became again a widower. It was upon this melancholy occasion that he gave vent to his grief in that exquisite

"Methought I saw my late espouséd saint Brought to me, like Alcestis, from the grave," &c.

In 1658 Oliver Cromwell was gathered to his fathers, and his late secretary again lifted his voice in the proclamation of principles which he feared might be en-dangered, and in 1659 gave to the nation his Treatise of Civil Power in Ecolesiastical Causes, and Considerations touching the likeliest Means to remove Hirelings out of the Church. In the next year the face of affairs was altogether changed by the return of the king and the reestablishment of monarchy; and so important a promoter of "sedition and rebellion" as the opponent of Salmasius was not likely to escape condign punishment. He therefore very naturally took the precaution to keep out of the of the new Government until the passage of the Act of Oblivion, August 29, 1660. Milton's fame as a poet and a scholar was so widely spread throughout Europe, and his defence of the execution of Charles I, had made him so obnoxious to the adherents of the sufferer, that we may readily believe he was an object of great interest to the members of the royal family. It is asserted that, after the publication of the Act of Oblivion allowed the blind scholar to resume his acoustomed exercise in public places, he was

"one day walking in St. James's Park, when he suddenly heard tepeated near him. "The king! the king!" Let us withdraw," he said to his guide: "I never loved kings!" Charles II. accosted the blind man: "Thus, sir, has Heaven punished you for having conspired against my fitther!" "Sire," he replied, "if the acts that affiliet us in this world be the chastisement of our faults, your ather must have been very guilty."
"Another version of this story makes the Duke of York

thus reindared:

thus rendered :

My your highness thinks that misfortunes are indexes of the written fileston, what must you think of your father's tragical inverse only last my eyer, he lost his head."

In 1864, Milton again untered the married state. His third wife was Elizabeth Minshull, not a daughter of Si Edward Minshull, as has been often alleged, but a chile of Randall Minshull, of Wistation, near Nantwick, in the county of Chester. This lady survived him more than half a century, dying in 1727. It was about this time that his happiness received another important augmenta-tion by his acquaintance with the excellent Thomas killwood, the Quaker, whose virtues have been com-memorated on an earlier page (555) of this Dictionary. In 1667, Milton gave to the world his Paradise Lost; in 1669, he published Accedence Commenc't Grammar, with Rules for Acquiring the Latin Tongue; in 1670 appeared his History of England, (to the Norman Conquest;) in 1671, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes, delighted the literary public of Europe; in 1672, he sent to the press Artis Logice plenior Institutio ad Petri Rami Methodum Concinnata; in 1673, he published a treatise Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration, and what best ligion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration, and what best Means may be used against the Growth of Popery; and in 1674, the year of his death, he put forth his Epistolæ Familiares, (1625 to '66,) and his Prolusiones quædam Oratoriæ in Collegio Christi habitæ, each in one volume. In 1682, 8vo, appeared his Brief History of Moscovia and of other less known Countries lying eastward of and of other less known Countries lying eastward of Russia as far as Cathny.

"This book was writ by the author's own hand before he lost his sight, and some time before his death dispost of it to be printed. But, it being small, the bookseller hop'd to have procured some other suitable piece of the same author's to have joyn'd with it, or cless it had been published ere now."—Advertisement at end of Preface.

How far Milton assisted his nephew, Edward Phillips, in the Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum, it is impossible to decide: the criticisms on Shakspeare and Marlowe are ascribed to the uncle with great confidence. The sad intelligence of the death of one who had filled so large a space in the history of his times, and who had laboured so zealously and so fearlessly for the advancement of civil and religious liberty, produced a profound sensation in Europe. Four days after his death his remains were carried to the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate.

"The funeral was attended," says Toland, "by all the author's learned and great friends in London,—not without a friendly concourse of the vulgar."

Milton was a little under the middle size, and possessed a muscular, well-compacted frame. His hair was light brown, his eyes gray, face oval, and his complexion ruddy, even in his later days. He was an excellent musician, performed well on the organ and bass-viol, and accompanied the instrument with his voice. He indulged moderately in the pleasures of the table, lived by exact moderately in the pleasures of the table, lived by exact rule in all things, and, of course, was an early riser.

"My morning haunts," he tells us, "are where they should be,—at home; not sleeping, nor concecting the surfeits of an irregular feast, but up and stirring: in winter, often ere the sound of any bell awaken men to labour or to devotion; in summer, as oft as the bird that first rises, or not much tardier, to read good authors or cause them to be read till the attention be weary or the memory have its full freight; then with useful and generous labours preceiving the body's health and hardiness, to render lightsome, clear, and not lumpish obedience to the mind, to the cause of religion and our country,—liberty,—when it shall require our firm hearts in sound bodies to stand and cover their gatation."

In early youth he had been accustomed to pursue his studies until a late hour:

"My father destined me, while yet a child, to the study of politic

"My father destined me, while yet a child, to the study of politic literature, which I embraced with such avidity that from the twelfth year of my age I hardly ever retired to my rest from mestudies till midnight,—which was the first source of injury to my eyes, to the natural weakness of which were added frequent heads aches."

In his later years he retired to bed at nine o'clock and rose at four in the summer and five in the winter season. After his morning-devotions, he had a chapter of the Hebrew Bible read to him, then breakfasted, and studied Hebrew Bible read to him, then breakfasted, and studied until twelve, at which hour he dined. After dinner he took an hour's exercise; played on the organ or base, viol; studied again until six o'clock; conversed with he visitors (of whom he had a superabundance) until eight took a light supper; smoked (if the truth must be told, to the great encouragement, doubtless, of the consumers of the Virginia weed) a pipe of tobacco; drank a glass of water, and then retired to rest. As we have already intimated, the curiosity of visitors who flocked to his intimated, the curiosity of visitors who flocked to his house to behold a man so famous became rather a burden-fome tribute. He was waited upon by many distinguished. foreigners, some of whom, Aubrey tells us, came to England for no other purpose than to see Cromwell and Milfon,

"He was mightly importuned," says Anbrey, "to go inte France and Italy: foreigners came much to see him, and much admired him, and offered him great preferments to come over to

Of a visit of one of his own countrymen Jonathan Alchardson gives us the following account:

"An ancient clergyman of Dorsetshire-Dr. Wright—found John Milton in a small chamber hong with rusty green, sitting in an allow-chair and dressed nearly in black; pale, but not cadaverous: his hands and feet gouty, and with chalk-stones. . . He need also to sit in a grey coarse doth coat at the door of his house near Bunbill Fields, in warm, sunny wenther, to enjoy the fresh air, and so, as well as in his room, received the visits of people of distinguished parts as well as quality."

The same authority informs us that "He had a gravity in his temper, not niclanshely, or not till the latter part of his life, not sour, not morose or ill-natured, but a certain severity of mind,—a mind not condescending to little things."

It will be understood that when we quote "Jonathan Richardson" we intend to designate the Notes on Milton pub. by Jonathan Richardson and his son Jonathan in 1734, (post.)

Milton's daughter Deborah testifies that her father was

"delightful company, the life of the conversation, and that on account of a flow of subject and an unaffected cheerfulness and civility." The great poet had five children,—viz.: By his first wife (1) Anna, b. 1646, married a master-builder, and d. not long afterwards; 2. Mary, b. 1648, d. unmarried; 3. John, b. 1650, d. in infancy; 4. Deborah, b. 1652, married Abraham Clarke, a weaver in Spitalfields, and d. 1727. By his second wife (5) A daughter, who lived only a few hours. Deborah was visited by Addison, and, being in straitened circumstances, received from him a handsome present; and she was well known to Prof. Ward, of Gresham College, and to Jonathan Richardson. Her son, Caleb Clarke, emigrated to Madras in the commencement of the 18th century, was parish clerk at Fort St. George from 1717 to '19, and was buried there on the 26th of October of the latter year. He left descendants, for an account of whom see an article, by Sir James Mackintosh, in the Edinburgh Review, xxv. 493-494.

The best portrait of Milton is said to be that drawn and engraved by Faithorne, prefixed to Milton's History of Britain, 1670, 4to. See Allan Cunningbam's note to Johnson's Life of Milton in Cunningham's ed. of Johnson's Poets, 1854, i. 131. "I heard some particulars," he says, "from a person that had once been his amanuensis, which were confirmed to me by his daughter, now dwelling in London, and by a lotter written to me, at my desire, by his last wife, who is still alive. I perused the papers of one of his nephews, learned what I could in discourse with the other, and bastly consulted such of his acquaintance as, after the best inquiry, I was able to discover."

"It may surprise one after this," remarks Mr. Keightley, "to find the life so meagre as it is; but the truth is, blography is an art, and those who do not possess it are unable to make a propuse of the materials which may be at their disposal."—Keightley Life, Ar. of Millen, 115.

"A life of Milton is yet [1827] a desideratum in our literature.

The new Life by Mr. Todd will not supply the defect of which we have spoken. It diserns criticism by its perfect modesty and absence of protension; but it has more the air of a legal instrument than of a poetical memoir. . . "We are not so absurd as to think that the 'Paradise Lost' contains no passages which might inspire a true painter. II. CRITICAL OPINIONS ON MILTON'S PRINCIPAL WORKS.

1. MILTON THE PORT. PARADISE LOST.

As early as 1839, Milton, in his verses to Manso, Marquis of Villa, intimates his intention of writing a peop of no ordinary pretensions:

"O mihi si mea sors talem concedat amicum, Photheos decorassa virus qui tam bone norit, Siquando indigenos revocabo in carmina regi orquamo mangenes revenue in carmina reges, Arturunque etiam sub terris bella moventem! Aut dicam invictae sociali factere mense Magnanimos herosa: et, o modo spiritus adsit, Frangam saxonicas Britonum sub Marte phalanges," &c.

Arthur, the British prince, is again referred to as bis hero in some lines in the Epitaphium Damonis, written not long after his return from England:

"I pse ego Dardania Rutinjina per aquora puppes Dicam, et Pandrasidos regium vetus Inogenieo, Bremumque Arviragumque duces, priscumque Bellium, Et tanden Amoricos Britonum sub lege colonis; Tun gravidam Arturo, fatali irande, logernen, Mendaces vultus, assumptaque Garlois arma. Meriloi dolus," Vide Keightley's Life, &c. of Milton, 397-402.

"It may be doubted whether he would have succeeded on such a topic. His austere character would seem to have been better fitted to feel the impulses of religious enthusiasm than those of chivalry; and England has no reason to regret that her most sublime post was reserved for the age of Cronwell instead of the remainte reign of Elizabeth."—WM. H. PRESCOTT: Miscellanies, 1885, 415. In his Reason of Church Government urged against Prelaty, pub. in 1641, he speaks of wAn inward prompting which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent study.—which I take to be my portion in this life, —joined to the strong proposity of nature, I might perhaps loave something so written to after-times as they should not willingly let it die?

For the consummation of this laudable project he relies

"From a promise like this," remarks Dr. Johnson, "at once fervid, plons, and rational, might be expected the 'Paradise Lost.'"

Aubrey says that he commenced Paradise Lost in 1658; but doubtless he had carefully revolved the subject in his but doubtless he had carefully revolved the singlet in ans mind long before that date. We are told that it was ready for the press in 1665, two years before its publication. It was sold to Simmons, the bookseller, for £5 in hand, £5 more on the sale of 1300° copies of the first edition, £5 more on the sale of 1300 copies of the second edition, and £5 more after the sale of 1300 copies of the third edition no edition to exceed 1500 copies.

After the publication of the third edition, in 1678, Mrs. Milton transferred all her right in the work (April 29, 1681)

"So that," says Hayley, "twenty-eight pounds, at different times in the course of thirteen years, is the whole pecuniary reward which this great performance produced to the poet and his widow."

Simmons sold out to Brabason Aylmer for £25, and he disposed of his interest to Jacob Tunson—one-half of it August 17, 1683, and the other half March 24, 1690—for a large advance. It would be difficult to compute how many hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling have been paid for Paradise Lost, in Great Britain and America, in the one hundred and ninety years which have elapsed (we write in January, 1858) since its first publication. Pickering sold the agreement to Sir Thomas Lawrence for £60; he repurchased it at the sale of Lawrenco's library at Christie's, June, 1830, for £63, and resold it to Samuel Rogers for one hundred guiness. Moore remarks, in his Rogers for one hundred guiness. Moore remarks, in his Diary, October 21, 1828, "Called at Pickering's, in Chancery Lane, who showed us the original agreement between Milton and Symonds for the payient of five pounds for Paradise Lost." The contrast of this sum with the £2000 given for [the unexpired term of the copyright of] Mrs. Rundell's 'Cookery' comprises a history in Itself. Pickering, too, gave forty-five guiness for this whole agreement,—three times as much as the sum given for the poem. It was part payanest, I think (I)"—Moore's Memoirs, dc., 1853, 110.

"It is well known that Milton never enjoyed in his lifetime the reputation which he deserved. His Puradise Lost was long neglected: prejudices against an applogist for the regicides, and against a work not wholly purged from the cant of former times, kept the ignorant world from porceiving the prodigious merit of that performance. Lord Somers, by encouraging a good edition of it about twenty years after the author's death, first brought it into request; and Tonson, in his dedication of a smaller edition, speaks of it as a work just beginning to be known. Even during the prevalence of Milton's party he seems never to have been much regarded. And Whitlocke talks of one Milton, as he calls him, a billed man, who was employed in translating a trenty with Sweden into Latin. These forms of expression are amusing to posterity, who consider how obscure Whitlocke himself—though Lord-Keeper and sunbassador, and, indeed, a man of great abilities and merit—has become in comparison of Milton."—Hume's Hist. of Eng., Bowyers's ed., 1806, iv. 666-687.

Mr. Southey also remarks.

"The fact is, that the estimation in which Milton is now held disables us from judging calmly of the rank in which he stood with his cotomporaries. Many years after the publication of the delightful poems of his youth, he speaks of himself to Salmasius as of a porson but little known, (v. ii. 381.) Waller—not Milton—was long reckoned the 'Virial' of the nation."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 41.

The mention of Waller will doubtless remind some of our readers of his contemptuous allusion to Paradise Lost, which we shall presently have occasion to quote.

But is it quite certain that Paradise Lost was so greatly neglected by the generation which witnessed its birth? Let us hear something on the other side:

"The sale of thirteen hundred copies in two years, in opposi-tion to so much recent entuity, and to a style of versification new to all and disparsing to many, was an uncommon example of the prevalence of genius. The demand did not immediately inthe prevalence of genius. The demand did not immediately in-ercease; for many more readers than were supplied at first the matten did not afford. Only three thousand were sold in eleven years; for it forced its way without assistance, its admirers did not dare to publish their opinion, and the opportunities now given of astructing attention by advertisements were then very few; the means of preclaiming the publication of new books have been pro-duced by that general Herattre which now pervades the nation through all its ranks."—Dr. Jonson: Lives of the Poets, Cunning-lance ed.; i. 124. hand's ed., i. 124. And see Mr. Cauningham's note.

New Hallam, commenting on the above, remarks,

"It would hardly, however, he said even in this age, of a poem 3000 copies of which had been sold in eleven years, that its success had been small; and some, perhaps, might doubt whether Paradish Lost published eleven years aince would have met with a greater damand. There is sometimes a want of congeniality in public basis which no power of genius will overcome. For bilitun it must be said by every one conversant with the literature of the east that pieceded Addison's Amous criticism, from which some have duted the reputation of Paradise Lost, that he took his place among great posts from the beginning."—Let. Ellet. of Europe, 4th

"Millers's politics lengt him down; but the epigram of Dryden, and the very maje of his work in proportion to the less reading time of he published, prove him to have been hancered by his contem-porigies. I will venture to assert that the sale f the Paradiss Lost was greater in the first four years after its publication that that of 'The Excursion' (of Wordsworth) in the same number, with the difference of nearly a century and a half between them of time and of thousands in point of general readers."—Lond Braox: Fumphite in answer to Blackwe. Mag., (unpublished.) See Moore's Life of Byron, vol. if.

"Milton's poetical writings do not seem to have been held in that neglect by his contemporaries which is commonly supposed. He had attracted too much sitention as a political controversialist, was too much feared for his talents as well as hated for his prin ciples, to allow any thing which fell from his pen too as a noticed."—Wh. "The strange misrepresentations long prevalent among our selves respecting the slow progress of Militon's reputation, sanctioned as they were both by Johnson and by Thomas Warton, have produced ridiculous effects abroad. On the 16th of November, 1814, a Parisian poet, named Camponon, was, in the present mulnippy state of French interature, received at the Academy as the successor of the Abbé Beille. In his Discours de Réception he speaks of the abbés translation 'de ce Paradis Perdu, dont Pangleterre est si têre depuis qu'elle a cossé d'en ignorer le mérite. The President, M. Regnault de St. Jean d'Angeley, said that M. Delille repaid our hospitality by translating Mitton,—'en doublant ainsi la célébrité du Poète dont le genie a inspiré à l'Angeletre un si tardif mais si légitime orgenel.'"—'Sir Janes Mackintosu: Miscell., 1854, il. 501, n.; from Adva. Sir William Temple, in his catalogue of writers who The Duke of Buckingham and Lord Rochester, the Earl of Clarendon and Richard Baxter, are equally silent. We next quote a verdict of Dryden. The Earl of Dorset being one day in Simmons's book-store, the latter handed him a copy of Paradise Lost, begged him to read it and send him purchasers for it. His lordship perused it himself, and then lent it to Dryden, who returned it with these words: "This man will cut us all out, and the ancients too."

In the next year after the death of Milton, Dryden calls Paradise Lost "one of the greatest, most noble, and most subline poems which either the age or nation has produced;" and he puts Milton on the same footing with duced;" and he puts Milton on the same footing with Homer. Virgil, and Tasso. (Prose Works, by Malone, ii. 397, 403.)

The following lines of Dryden's are familiar to many of our readers:

"Three poets, in three distant ages born, dreece. Itsly, and England did adorn: The first in loftiness of thought surpass'd; The next in majesty; in both the last. The force of Nature could no further go: To make a third, she join'd the other two."

"His thoughts are clevated," again says Dryden, "his words sounding, and no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms, and the latin elegancism of Yirgil."—Ded. of Jurenal, 1683.

sangels, and the like. In general, this unusual style better serves to awaken our ideas in the descriptions and in the imaging and pleaturesque parts than it agrees with the lower sert of marrations, the classrater of which is simplicity and purity. Milton has everal of the latter, where we find not an antiquated affected, or uncouth word for some hundred lines together,—as in his fifth book, the latter part of the eighth, the former of the tenth and eleventh books, and in the narration of Michael in the twelfth. I wonder, indeed, that he who ventured (contrary to the practice of all other optc poets) to imitate Himmer's lownesses in the narrative should not also have copied his plainness and perspicuity in the dramatic parts, affect in his speeches (where clearness above all is necessary) there is frequently such transposition and forced construction that the typy sense is not to be discovered without a second or third reading; and in this certainly he ought to be no example."— Postscript to the Odyssey.

Pope also complains of the occasional "creeping" referred to by Dryden:

Milton's strong pinions now not heaven can bound,
Now, serpent-like, in prose he sweeps the ground;
In quibbles angel and archangel join,
And God the Father turns a school divine."

In slender book his vast design unfold.

Rebelling angels, the forbidden troe,
Reav'n, hell, carth, chaos, all,—the argument
Held me a while misdoubting his intent.
That he would ruin (for I saw him strong)
The sacred truths to fuble and old song;
So Sampson grop'd the temple's post in spite,
The world o'rewhelming to revenge his sight.

That majesty which thro' thy work doth reign Draws the devout, deterting the profune;
And things divine thou treat'st of in such state. As them preserves, and thee, inviolate.
At once delight and horror on us selze. Thou sing'st with so much gravity and ease, And above human flight dost sear aloft.
With plume so strong, so equal, and so soft;
The bird nam'd from that Parulise you sing. So never flags but always keeps on wing.
Where could'st thou works of such a compass find?
Whence furnish such a vast expanse of mind?
Just Heav'n thee, like Tiresias, to requite.
Rewards with prophecy thy loss of sight."
"As for Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with so much justice," says layden, "his subject is not that of a heroic poem, properly so called. Paradise Lost:

"Neither will I justify Milton," says Dryden. "for his blank verse, though I may excuse him by the example of Hannibal Caro and other Italians who have used it; for, whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme, (which I have not now the leisure to examine.) his own particular reason is plainly this,—that rhyme was not his talent: he has neither the case of doing it nor the graces of it,—which is manifest in his Juvenilla, or verses written in his youth, where the rhyme is always constrained and forcod, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the suil is most pliant and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymer though not a poet."—Ded. of Juvenal, 1693.

The opinions of that truly great man—whom it is also the present fashion to decry—will ever be received by me with that deference which thme will restore to him from all; but, with all humility, I am not persuaded that the Paradise Lost would not have been more nobly conveyed to posterity, not, perhaps, in heroic couplets,—although even they could mustain the subject if well balanced,—but in the stanzs of Sponser or of Tasso, or in the Teras rims of Dante, which the powers of Milton could easily have grafted on our language."—Loss Brack: Pamphic, do. in Moore's Life of Byron, vol. ii.

"The blank metre of Paradise Lost is more various, more rich in the melody of cadences, than that of any other English poem. This, pechaps, is owing to a circumstance not generally observed,—that Milton is almost the only writer in blank verse who had previously made himself a perfect master of rhyme and the rhyming measures."—Iday. It Synamus. Memori of Milton.

"Milton's blank verse is the only blank verse in the language (except Shakspeare's) that deavere the name of verse. Dr. Johnson, who had modelled his ideas of versification on the regular sing-song of Pope, condemns the Paradiso Lost as largeh and unoqual. I shall not pretent to say that this is not sometimes the one; for where a degree of excellence beyond the mechanical rules of art is autempted the poet must sometimes fail. But I inaging that there are more perfect examples in Milton of musical expression, or of an adaptation of the sound and movement of the verse to the meaning of the passage, than in all our other writers, whether of hink verse put together, (with the exception already mentioned.)... Milton has himself given us the theory of his versification:

"The boldness, freedom, and variety of our blank verse is infinitely more favourable than rhyme to all kinds of sublime poetry. The language and versification of the 'Paradise Lost' are pecu-"The language and versification of the 'Paradise Lost' are peca-liar in being so much more necessarily correspondent to each other than those in any other poem or poet. The connexion of the sen-tences and the position of the words are exquisitely artificial; but the position is rather according to the logic of passion or universal logic than to the logic of grammar. Milton attempted to make the English language obey the logic of passion as perfectly as the Greek and Latin: hence the occasional harshness in the con-struction."—Colemon: Lect. X.

"We should not fulfil our duty were we not to say one word on what has been justly celebrated.—the harmony of Milton's wesignation. It is numbers have the prime charm of expressiveness. They vary with, and answer to, the depth, or tenderness, or sub-limity of his conceptions, and hold intinate alliance with the soul. Like Michael Angelo, in whose hands the marble was said to be fixible, he bends our language—which foreigners repreach with hardness—into whatever form the subject demands. All the treasures of sweet and solema sound are at his command. Words hard and discordant in the writings of less gifted men flow through his poetry in a full stream of harmony. This power over language is not to be ascribed to Milton's musical ear. It belongs to the soul. It is a gift or exercise of gonins, which has power to impress itself on whatever it touches, and finds or frames in sounds, motions, and material forms, correspondencies and harmonies with its own fervid thoughts and seeings."—W. E. Charmonic, D.J. Reang with Petitod Gessius of Milton.

Marvell defends Milton in the use of rhyme:

"Well might thou secen thy readers to allure; Whit inking rhyme, of thy own some scrure; Whit the Town-bays writes all the while and spells, And, like a peck-hore, tirre without his bells.

The poets tag them; we far fashion wear.

To the third title-page, 1688, of the first edition, we find the following preface:

"THE PRINTER TO THE READER.

"Courteous Reader: There was no Argument at first intended to the Book; but, for the satisfaction of many that have desired it. I have procur'd it. and withall a Reason of that which stumbleth many others, why the Poem Rimes not.

Then follows Milton's own defence,-not signed by him,

"The measure is English Herbic Verse, without Rime, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin; Rime being no necessary Adjunct or true Ornament of Poem or goed Verse, in longer Works especially, but the invention of a barbarous Age to set off wretched Matter and lame Meeter; grac't indeed since by the use of some Enmous Modern Poets, carried away by Custon, but much to their own vexation, bindrance, and constraint, to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse, then else they would have exprest them. Not without cause, therefore, some both Italian and Spanish Poets of prime note have rejected Rime both in longer and shorter Works, as have also, long since, our best English Tragelles; as a thing of itself, to all judicious earse, triveal and of no true musical delight,—which consists only in upt Numbers, if quantity of Syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the Jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned Ancients, both in Poetry and all good Orstory. This neglect then of Rimes so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to viling readers, that it rather is to be exteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recover'd to Herole Poem from the troublesom and modern bondage of Rimeing."

at a larty data when the youthful pout how how

Yet at a later date, when the youthful poet has been matured into the deliberative critic, he resolves to apply the canon of criticism to the great poem upon the altar of whose praise he had offered the first-fruits of his glowing admiration; and he thus announces his intention to the admiration; and he thus announces his intention to the literary world:

"As the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, the state of the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, the state of the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, the state of the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, any other, I shall enter into a regular criticism upon his Paradise Lost, which I shall publish every Saturday till I have given my thoughts upon that poem."—Spectator, No. 262, Dec. 31, 1711.

The criticisms which follow occupy 18 numbers of The Spectator.—viz.: 267, 273, 279, 285, 291, 297, 303, 309, 314, 321, 327, 333, 339, 345, 351, 357, 363, 369; published January 5, 1711-12, to May 3, 1712.

Bit James Maskintosh, noticing "the strange misrepresentations long prevalent among ourselves respecting the slow progress of Milton's reputation." (onte.) remarks that "By the language in which Addison amounces his criticism—'As the first place among our English poets is due to Milton, I shall enter into a regular criticism upon his Paradise Lost, &c.—it is clear that he takes for granted tile paramount greatness of Milton, and that his object was not to disinter a poet who had been buried in mijuschelivien, but to illustrate the rules of criticism by observations on the writings of him whom all his readers revered as the greatest poet of thour country."—Mackisatoh's Miscell. Works, E. 300: from Addison. Xxv. 404.

The reader will find Addison's elaborate criticism (of course, in any edition of The Spectator) in vol. iii. of Bohn'e ed. of Addison's Works, with Bishop Hurd's Notes, 1854, pp. 176-283. We shall quote a few passages from these pages, which, we think, will tempt the admirer of Milton and who is not proud of that title?) to peruse carefully the whole.

"If we look into the characters of Milton we shall fird that he has introduced all the variety his fable was capable of receiving. The whole species of mankind was in two persons at the time to which the subject of his poem is confined. We have, however, four distinct characters in these two persons. We see iann and woman in the highest innocence and perfection and in the most abject state of guilt and infirmity. The two last characters are, indeed, very common and obvious; but the two first are not only more magnificent, but more new, than any characters either in Virgil or Homer, or, indeed, in the whole circle of nature, [p, 182.]
"A Roman could not but rejoice in the escapes, successes, and victories of Æneas, and be grieved at any defeats, misfortunes, or disappointments that befell him: as a tire-k must have had the same regard for Achilles. And it is plain that each of these posms "If we look into the characters of Milton we shall find that he disappointments that beful him; as a tireck must have had the same regard for Achilles. And it is plain that each of these poems have lost this great advantage among those readers to whom their heroes are as strangers or indifferent persons. Milton's poem le admirable in this respect, since it is impossible for any of its readers, whatever nation, country, or people he may belong to, not to be related to the persons who are the principal actors in it; but, what is still infinitely more to its advantage, the principal actors in this poem are not only our progenitors, but our representatives. We have an actual interest in every thing they do; and no less than our utmost happiness is concerned and lies at stake in their behaviour, [p. 184.].

in this poem are not only our progenitors, but our representatives. We have an actual interest in every thing they do; and no less than our utmost happiness is concerned and lies at stake in their behaviour. [p. 184.].

"Virgit has excelled all others in the propriety of his sentiments. Milton shines likewise very much in this particular; nor must we omit one consideration which adds to his honour and reputation. Homer and Virgil introduced persons whose characters are commonly known among men, and such as are to be met with either in history or in ordinary conversation. Milton's characters, most of them, lie out of nature, and were to be formed purely by his own invention. . . . Adam and Eve before the Fall are a different species from that of mankind who are descended from them; and none but a peet of the most unbeanded invention and the most exquisite judgment could have filled their conversation and behaviour with so many circumstances during their state of innocence. [p. 186.] Milton's chief talent, and, indeed, his distinguishing excellence, lies in the sublimity of his thoughts. There are others of the moderns who rival him in every other part of poetry; but in the greatness of his sentiments he triumphs over all the poets, both modern and ancient. Homer only excepted. [Homer only excepted. "—Bisnor Hund.] It is impossible for the imagination of man to distend itrelf with greater ideas than those which he has laid together in his first; second, and sixth books. The seventh, which describes the creation of the world, is likewise wonderfally sublime, though not so up to str up emotion in the mind of the reader, nor, consequently, so perfectly in the epic way of writing, because it is filled with less action. Let the judicious reader compare what Longinus has observed on several passages in Homer, and he will find parallels for most of them in the Paradise Lost. [p. 187, 189.] If clearness and perspiculty were only to be reader, nor, consequently, so perfectly in the epic way of writing, because it is fille following passages:

"The great masters in composition know very well that man an elegant phrase becomes improper for a poet or an orator whe, it has been debased by common use. . Aristotle has observe that the idiomatic style may be avoided, and the sublime farmed by the following methods. First, by the use of metaphore. such as those in Milton: as those in Milton :

'Imparadised in one another's arms.'
"And in his hand a reed Stood waving, tipt with fire.'
'The grassy clods now calved.'
'Spangled with eyes.'

"In these and innumerable other instances the metaphors are very bold and just. I must, however, observe that the exceptions are not thick-sown in Milton, which always avours to mark of wit; that they never clash with snother.—which, as Aristotic is serves, turns a sentence into a kind of enigma or riddle; and that he seldom has recourse to them where the proper and natural words will do as well. Another way of raising the language and giving it a poetical turn is to make use of the idioms of other tongues. Virgil is full of the Greek forms of speech which the critica call Helichisms, as Horace in his Odes abounds with them much more than Virgil. I need not mention the several dialects which Homer has made use of for this end. Milton, in conformity with the practice of the ancient poets, and with Aristotle's rule, has, infined a great many Latinians, as well as Greecisms, and semetimes Hebraisms, into the language of his poem. . . I must likewise take notice that there are in Milton several words of his own colning, as Carbervan, mer realed, helidoom d, emb you atons, and many others. If the reader is offended at this liberty in our English poet, I would recommend him to a discourse in Fluturch, which shows us how frequently Homer has made use of the same liberty.

"Milton, by the above-mentioned helps, and by the choice of the noblest words and phrases which our tongue would after him, has carried our language to a greater height than any of the English poets have ever done before or after him, and made the sublimity poets have ever done before or after film, and made the sublimity of his style equal to that of his sentiments. ... The redundancy of those several ways of speech which Aristotle calls foreign language, and with which Milton has so very much enriched, and in some places darkened, the hunguage of his poem, was the more proper for his use because his poem is swritten in blank verse. ... is shall close these reflections upon the language of Paradise Lost with observing that Milton has copied after Homer, rather than Virgil, in the length of his periods, the copionsness of his phrases, and the running of his verses into one another, [pp. 190, 191, 192, 193, 194. Horace advises a noet to consider thoughty the nature I shall close these reflections upon the language of Paralise Lost with observing that Milton has copied after Homer, rather than Virgil, in the length of his periods, the copiousness of his phrases, and the running of his verses into one another. [pp. 196, 194, 193, 194.] Horace advises a poet to consider thoroughly the nature and force of his genus. Milton seems to have known perfectly well wherein his strength lay, and has therefore chosen a subject entirely conformable to those talents of which he was master. As his genius was wonderfully turned to the subinne, his subject is the noblect that could have entered into the thoughts of man. Every thing that is truly great and astonishing has a place in it. The whole system of the intellectual world, the chaos and the creation, heaven, earth, and hell, enter into the constitution of his poem. Having in the first and second books represented the infernal world with all its horrors, the thread of his field animally leads him into the opposite regions of bliss and glory. . . He has represented all the abstruse doctrines of predestimation, free will, and grace, as also the great points of the mean nation and redemption, (which naturally grow up in a poen, that treats of the fall of mun), with great energy of expression, and in a clearer and stronger light than I ever met with in any other writer. As these points are dry in themselves to the generality of readers, the condex and clear manner in which he has treated them is very much to be admired, as is likewise that particular at which he made use of, in the interspersing of all those graces of poetry which the subject was capable of receiving. [pp. 217, 218.] Those who look vito Homer are surprised to find his buttles still rising one above another, and improving in horror, to the conclusion of the lind. Milton's flight of angels is wrought up with the same beauty. It required great pregnancy of invention and strength of magination to fill this battle with such circumstances and stronger light or trivial. . . There

'The thought of the golden compasses is conceived altogether in insper's spirit, and is a very noble incident in this wonderful description. The beauties of description in this book [VII.] lie so very thick that it is impossible to enumerate them in this paper. The poet has employed on them the whole energy of our longue. The several great scenes of the creation rise up to view one after another in such a manner, that the reader scenis presents this wonderful work and to assist among the choirs of angals who are the speciators of it. How glorious is the conclusion of the first day! . We have the same clevation of thought in the third day, when the mountains were brought forth, and the deep was made. We have also the rising of the whole vegetable world made. We have law the the sum of the special world made. The second of the spring that the reader's in this day's work, which is filled with all the graces that other poets have lavished on their description of the spring, and leads the reader's imagination into a theatre equally surprising and beautiful. . . The poet afterwards represents the Messiah returning into heaven and taking a survey of his great work where the author describes that great period of time, filled with so many glorous circumstances, when the heavens and earth were finished, when the Messiah accended up in triumph through the overlasting gates, when he looked down with pleasure upon his new creation, when every part of nature seemed to refoce in its existence, when the morning stars seng tegether, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. [244, 248, 246, 247, 248.] Adam, to detain the angel, [Book VIII.s] enters afterwards upon his own history, and relates to him the circumstances in which he found hinned upon his creation, as also his conversation with his Maker, and his first meeting with Key. There is no part of the poem more spick to raise the attention of the resder than this discourse of our great ancestor; as nothing can be more surprising and delightful to a than to hear the sentiments that arose in the first man while he was yet new and fresh from the hands of his Creator. The poet has interwoven every thing which is delivered upon this sudject in holy writ with so many beautiful imaginations of his own that nothing can be conceived more just and natural than this whole opisade. As our author knew this subject could not but be agreeable to his reader, he would not throw it into the relation of the six days' work, but reserved it for a distinct opisade, that he might have an opportunity of expaniating upon it more at large, [p. 250.] That secret intoxication of pleasure, with all those transient flushings of guilt and joy, which the poet represents in our first parents upon their eating the durib did fruit, to those flaggings of shirits, damps of sorrow, and mutual accusations which succeed it, [Book XI.] are conceived with a wooderfol imaltunton and described in very natural sentiments. . Perhaps we cannot better conclude an extract already sufficiently lengthened than by the following excellent

"I have binted, in my sixth paper on Milton, that an heroic poem, according to the opinion of the best critics, ought to end happily, and leave the mind of the reader, after having conducted it through many doubts and fears, sorrows and disquictudes, in a state of tranquillity and satisfaction. Milton's fable, which had so many other qualifications to recommend it, was deficient in this particular. It is here, therefore, that the poet has shown a most exquisite judgment, as well as the finest invention, by finding out a method to supply this natural defect in his subject. Accordingly, he leaves the adversary of mankind, in the last view which he gives of him. under the lowest state of mortification and disappointment. We see him chewing ashes, grovelling in the dust, and loaden with supernumerary pains and torments. On the contrary, our two first parents are comforted by dreams and visions, chosred with promises of salvation, and in a manner raised to a greater happiness than that which they had forfeited. In short, Satan is represented miscrable in the height of inserty."—pp. 279, 280.

Of Addison's criticiam Sir Egerton Brydges remarks, "It ought to be studied and almost got by heart by every cultivated mind which understands the English language. It is in all respects a masterly performance,—just in thought, full of taste and the finest sensibility, oloquent and besufful in composition, whichy learned, and so clearly explanatory of the true principle of poetry that whoever is master of them cannot mistake in his decision of postical morit. It puts Milton above all other poets on such tests as cannot be resisted."—LA/s, 1. 221.

Again:
"I must here also repeat my conviction, that of all critics Addi, aon is the most beautiful, eloquent, and just: he enters deep into the fable, the imagery, and the sentiment; most of the Scheckop; mentators merely busy themselves with the explanation of the maning. We are bound to study in which the Milton has exercised hir mighty powers of invention and imagina-

Sion, and what ought to be their purposes, their qualities, and their merits. If any one thinks the imagination to be an idle and supply power, he is as hard and dull as he is ignorant and blind. In the 'Paradise Lost' we have demonstrated what a grand and holy imagination can do."—Remarks on Book L., Paradise Lost, 1830.

"Addison, as is well known, was the first to bring them [Milton's meris] loto popular view, by a beautiful specimen of criticism that has permanently connected his name with that of his illustrious subject "—William H. Mr. Hallam by no means shares in this enthusiasm. After quoting a passage from Coleridge on The Character

After quoting a passage from Coleridge on The Character of Satan as delineated by Milton, (post,) he remarks, "In reading such a paragraph as this, we are struck by the vast improvement of the highest criticism—the philosophy of seathetics—since the days of Addison. His papers in The 'spectator on Paradise Lost were perhaps superior to any criticism that had been written in our language; and we must always acknowledge their good sense, their judicionaness, and the vast service they did to our literature in settling the Paradise Lost on its proper level. But how little do they safisfy us, even in treating of the natura nature naturenas, the individual genius of the author! Even in the periodical criticism of the present day, in the midst of much that is affected, much that is precipitate, much that is written for mere display, we find occasional reflections of a profundily and discrimination which we should seek in vain through Dryden, or Addison, or the two Wartons, or even Johnson, though nuch apperior to tho rest. Hurd has perhaps the merit, "&c.—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, ili. 474, n. (The remainder of this passage will be found in our life of Richard Hurd, D.D., p. 926 of this Distinary.) Dictionary.)

Our readers will bear us testimony that we are not sparing in our quotations from, and references to, the periodical criticism" so justly commonded by Mr. Hallam. We shall now proceed to quote some extracts from Johnson's celebrated critique on Paradise Lost: in our life of the lexicographer we considered at sufficient length (see pp. 976-977 of this Dictionary) the merits and demerits of Johnson's Life of Milton :

"I am now to examine," remarks the critic, "'Paradise Lost,' a poem which, considered with respect to design, may claim the first place, and with respect to performance the second, among the productions of the human mind. By the general consent of critics the first praise of genius is due to the writer of an epic poem, as it requires an assemblage of all the powers which are singly sufficient for other compositions. . . . The subject of an epic poem is naturally an event of great importance. That of Milton is not the destruction of a city, the conduct of a colony, or the foundation of an empire. His subject is the fate of works, the revolutions of Heaven and of earth; rebellion against the Supreme King, raised by the highest order of created beings; the overthrow of their host, and the punishment of their crime; the creation of a new race of reasonable creatures, their original happiness and fanceence, their forbiture of immortality, and their restoration to hope and peace. "I am now to examine," remarks the critic, "' Paradise Lost;

Aftent events can be hastened or retarded only by persons of elevated dignity. Before the greatness displayed in Milton's poem all other greatness shrinks away. The weekest of his agents are the highest and noblest of human beings, the original parents of mankind,—with whose actions the elements consented, on whose rectitude or deviation of will depended the state of terrestrial nature and the condition of all the future inhabitants of the globs.

"Of the other agents in the poem, the chief are such as it is irreversuce to name on elight occasions. The rest were lower powers which only the control of Omnipotence restrains from laying greation waste and filling the vast expanse of space with ruin and confusion. To display the motives and actions of beings thus superior, no far as human reason can oxamine them or human imagination represent them, is the task which this mighty peet has undertaken and performed. . . To the completeness or integrity of the design nothing can be objected: it has distinctly and clearly what Aristotle requires.—a beginning, a middle, and an end. There is, perhaps, no posm of the same length from which so little can be taken without apparent mutilation. . . The thoughts which are obseignably called forth in the progress are such as could only be produced by an imagination in the highest degree fervid and antiva, to which materials were supplied by incessant study and malinsiped curiosity. The heat of Militon's mind might be said to sublimate his learning, to throw off into his work the spirit of aciense, unminingled with its grosser parts. He had considered greation in its whole extent, and his descriptions are therefore harned. He had accentenated his imagination to unrestrained in-deligence, and his demospitions therefore were extensive. The characteristic quality of his postry is sublimity. He sometimes described to like alagant; but his element is the great. He can occurred to the alagant; but his element is the great. He can occurred to the latest the produced which his own gesting his was him more bountifully than others,—the power of signification of the said, on which he magint tire his faculty of which its magint tire his faculty without the could not the said, on which he magint tire his faculty without the said of extraorgance. . . . Of his moral neutineous it is hardly took praise to affirm that they excel those of all other posts; for this superfority he was indebted to his acquaintance with the incred writings. From the Italian writers it appears that the avactages of even Christian knowledge may be possedued in vaira. Ariosto's pravity is generally known; and, though the 'Delivenance of Jerusalem' may be considered as a sacred subject, the post has been very sparing of moral instruction. In Milton, every line breathes sencitly of thought and purity of manners, except when the train of the narration requires the introduction of the rebellious spirits; and even they are compelled to acknowledge their subjection to God in such a manner as excites reverence and confirms piety. The port, whatever be done, is always great. Dryden remarks that Milton has some flats among his elsevity work one part must be for the sake of others: a palace must have passages; a poem must have transitions. It is no more to be required that wit should always be blazing than that the sun abould always stand at moon. In a great work there is a vicinsifude of luminous and opaque parts, as there is in the world a succession of day and night. Milton, when he has expatisted in the sky, may be allowed sometimes to revisit earth; for what other author gwereard so high or sustained his flight so long? . Whatever be the faults of his diction, he cannot want the praise of copiousness and variety: he was master of his language in its full extent, and has selected the melodious words with such diligence that from his book alone the art of English poetry might be learned. his book alone the art of English poetry might be learned.

His work is not the greatest of heroic poems only because it is not

After enumerating some alleged defects in the poem, the critic continues:

"Such are the faults of that wonderful performance, 'Paradise Lost,' which he who can put in balance with its beauties must be considered not as nice but as dull, as less to be consured for want of candour than pitied for want of sensibility."—Lives of the Most Emirant English Prets. We continue our citations of opinions upon Paradise Lost:

We continue our citations of opinions upon Paradise Lost:

"Such is the erulition applied to this most wonderful work, that nothing less than the conjoined attempts of a whole body of learned men for a century has been able to explain its mexhaustible allusions; and even yet the task is not completed. ... On that which pleases us individually, without consulting the feelings and opinions of others, we cannot rely; but when what delights us has made the same impression on gifted persons of all ages, and under all different circumstances, then we may be sure that its charms are intrinsic and such as it is important to bring out and render more impressive. Thus, Milton is full of imagery, which makes the spell of ilouer and Virgil. ... We do not read Milton in the same light as we read any other poet: his is the imagination of a sublime instructor: we give our faith through duty as well as will. If our fancy flags, we strain it that we may apprehend; we know that there is something which eur conception ought to reach. There is not an idle word in any of the delineations which the bard exhibits; nor is any picture merely addressed to the senses. Every thing therefore is invention, arising from novelty or complexity of combination: nothing is a more reflection from the mirror of the fancy. ... Milton has too much condensation to be fluent: a line or two often conveys a world of images and ideas: he expatistes over all time, all space, all possibilities: he unites earth with heaven, with helt, with all intermediate existences, animate and haanimate; and his illustrations are drawn from all learning, historical, natural, and speculative. In him, almost always, 'more is meant than meets the ear.' An image, an epithet, conveys a rich picture. ... To cite detached passages from other poets as containing a supposed similitude to Million is very fallacious. These are patches; Milton's is a uniform, close-vove, massy web of gold. Numerous particles of the ingredients may be truced in other authors: it is the combination and " Such is the erudition applied to this most wonderful work, that lines in Paradise Lost, though with many that are hard and, in a sammon use of the word, might be called pressic. Yet few are traily pressic, few wherein the tone is not someway distinguished from prose. The very artificial style of Milton, sparing in English Ridom, and his study of a rhythm not always the most grateful to sour ears, but preserving his blank verse from a trivial flow, is the cause of this elevation. It is at least more removed from a pressic addence than the slovenity rhymes of such contemporary pasts as Chamberlayne. His versification is entirely his own, framed on a Latin and chiefly a Virgilian model, the pause less frequently resting on the close of the line than in Homer, and much less than in our own dramatic poets. But it is also possible that the Italian and Spanish blank verse may have had some effect upon his car."

Mr. Hallam proceeds to notice some particulars in which Mitton has been censured, and remarks, in conclusion.

"The faults, however, of Paradise Lost are in general less to be called faults than necessary adjuncts of the qualities we most admire, and diosyncrasics of a nighty genius. The verse of Mitton is sometimes wanting in grace, and almost always in case; but what better can be said of his prose? His foreign idions are too frequent in the one: but they predominate in the other." — Ibid., 480.

We quote a portion of Campbell's criticism on Milton, which Lord Jeffrey culogizes as consisting of "splendid massacres and offerines not unworthy of the shripe;"

"In delineating the blessed spirits, Milton has exhausted all the Tasso had, indeed, portrayed an infernal council, and had given the hint to our poet of ascribing the origin of pagan worship to those reprobate spirits. But how poor and squalid, in comparison of the Miltonic Pandemonium, are the Seyllas, the Cyclopsos, and the Chimoras of the Infernal Council of the Jerusalom! Tassos's conclave of flends is a den of ugly, mongruous monsters. The powers of Milton's hell are godhke shapes and forms. Their appearance dwarfs every other poetical conception whom we turn our delighted eyos from contemplating them. It is not their external attributes alone which expand the magination, but their souls, which are as colossal as their stature,—their thoughts that sounder through eternity,—the pruc that burns amidst the ruins of their divine natures,—and their gains, that feels with the ardour and debates with the eloquence of heaven."—Cumpbell's Specimens of the British Poets, 242, 247.

"The interest of the poem arises from the daring ambitton and ferce passions of Satan, and from the account of the paradisalcal happiness and the loss of it by our first parents. Three-fourths of the work are taken up with these characters, and nearly all that relates to them is unmixed sublimity and beauty. The two first books alone are like two massy pulsars of solid gold. Satan is the most heroic subject that over was chosen for a poem; and the execution is as perfect as the design is lofty."—Hazilit's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Lect. III.

It is the character so often seen in little on the political stage. It exhibits all the restlessness, temerity, and cunning which have marked the nightly hunters of mankind from Niurod to Napoleon. The common faccination of man is that these great men as they are called, must act from some great motive. Milton has carefully marked in his Satan the intense selfishness, the alcohol of egotism, which would rather reign in hell than serve in heaven. To place this lust of self in opposition to denial of self or duty, and to show what exertions it would make and what pains endure to accomplish its end, is Milton's particular object in the character of Satan. But around this character he has thrown a singularity of daring, a grandour of sufferance, and a ruined splendour, which constitute the very height of poetic sublimity."—Coleridye's Renaus, p. 176.

We have fallen upon an essay of rare power and beauty, and must lengthen our quotations:

"Though he wrote the Paradise Lost at a time of life when images of beauty and tenderness are in general beginning to fade, even from those minds in which they have not been effaced by anxiety and disappointment, he aderned it with all that is most lovely and delightful in the physical and in the moral world. Neither Theoritus nor Ariosto had a finer or a more healthful sense of the pleasantness of external objects, or loved better to laxuriste antidst aunbeams and fuwer, the songs of nightingsets, the judge of summer fruits, and the coolness of shady fountains. His songeption of love unites all the voluptions essential by the property of the chivalric tournament, with all the pure and guist effection of an English freeside. His poetry reminds us of the miracles of Alpino scenery. Nooks and delia beautiful as shiry-land are smbosomed in its most rugged and gigantic elevations. The roses and myrties bloom unchilled on the verge of the avalancha... The only posse of modern times which can be compared to the Faradise Lost is the Divine Consedy... Of all the poets who have introduced into their works the agency of supernatural beings, Milton has succeeded best. Here lants decidedly yields to him; and, as this is a point on which many rash and ill-considered judgments have been pronounced, we feel inclined to dwell on it a little longer."—Ibid., 17, 28, 28.

And, among the many other essays upon the same subject, see that by Robert Southey, in the London Quarterly Review, xxxvi. 49-54; another by Hastitt, in his Lects: on Shakspeare and Milton, (Lect. II. of the series on the English Poets;) one by William H. Preacott, the bistorian, in his Biographical and Critical Miscellanies, 491-493; one by Mr. Keightley, in his Life, &c. of Milton, 1855. 448-429; another by Edward Expert in his Orations. 1855, 408-429; another by Edward Everett, in his Orations and Speeches, 1853, ii. 221-222; and that by the amiable enthusiast, Walter Savage Lander. . We appead brief quotations from three or four of the critics just named:

entusiast, watter savage Landor, "we appear brut quotations from three or four of the critice just named:
"It was said by Boutley of Warburton, in relation to his learning, that he never knew a man with so great an appetite and so bad a digestion. Mitton's digestion was admirable: whatever he borrowed from the ancients he made his own; in him it does not seem quotation, but coincidence. This was not the virtue of his day: applications of passages from the classics abound to profusion in contemporary authors; but they are schlom properly assimilated to the subject-matter: they are fragments of the Parthenon in the mush wails of a Turkish cottage. Milton used thout (if we may be allowed so homely an illustration) as the manufacturer uses rags,—not for patchwork, but for paper. His likeness to the ancients is much more that of expression than of feature. Sometimes, indeed, he makes an open and lavish display of his vast acquirements; but even here there is a ripeness in his knowledge which bears witness that it is not forced for the occasion, but is the fruit of years. The catalogue of the evil spirits in Paralise Lost is, perhaps, the most masterly account of ancient idolatry, brief as it is, in the English language, and at the same time serves to show that Milton had not only framed for himself a system of divinity, but a system of mythology also,—the latter, indeed, far the more mature of the two."—Rough Southers: Lon. Gear. Rev., xxxvi. 84–35.

Again, Southey remarks, in a letter to Horace Walpole, Bedford, Nov. 18, 1793:

"Milton is above comparison, and stands alone as much from the singularity of the subject as the excellence of the diction."— Life and Corresp., chap. i.

Simond's discovery that the poetry of Milton and Southey is to be placed on the same level; and chapter xvii. for Southey's avowal that he considered Wordsworth as great a poet as Milton: "A greater poet than Wordsworth," says Southey, "there never was nor ever will be." If Mr. Southey could prove the former assertion—and some, perhaps, might be bold enough to dissent—it would certainly difficult to establish the latter position. But we are wandering from our theme.

the difficult to establish the latter position. But we are wandering from our theme.

"The genius of both [Dante and Milton] was of the severest kind. For this reason, any display of their sensibility, like the light breaking through a dark cloud, affects us the more by contrast. Such are the sweet pictures of domestic biles in Paradise Lot, and the tender tale of Franceace di Rimini in the Inflaton. Such are sublime in the highest signification of the term; but Milton is an ideal poet, and delights in generalization, while Dante is the most literal of artists, and paints every thing in detail. He refuses no imagery, however mean, that can illustrate his subject. This is too notorious to require exemplification. He is, moreover, eminently distinguished by the power of depicting his thought by a single vigorous touch,—a manner well known in Italy under the name of Dantesque. It would not be easy for such a verse as the following, without sacrifice of idiom, to be combiness within the same compass in our language:

"It would be interesting to trace the similarity of tastes in these great minds, as exhibited in their pleasures equally with their serious pursuits,—in their exquisite sensibility to music, in their early fundness for those ancient romances which they have so often celebrated both in prose and verse; but our limits will not allow us to pursue the subject farther."—William II. The above may remind the reader of some elequent lines by the same author in another place:

"To say nothing of the Divina Commedia," where that rises from the perusal of 'Paradise Lost' without feeling his own conceptions of the angelic hierarchy quickened by those of the happired artift, and a new and sensible form, as it were, given temper which had before floated dim and undefined before him?"—Hist. of the Cong. of Mexico, 23d ed., 1885, i. 63.

"In 'Paradise Lost' we feel as if we were admitted to the order courts of the lundita. In that all-glorious temple of gentles his spired by truth, we catch the full dispasson of the insering origina. With its first choral swell the soul is lifted from the carela, in the Divina Commelje' the man, the Florentine, the artifed disserting stands out, from fare' to last, hreating defense and this lift.

Milton, is some of his prose works, betrays the partisan also; but in his poetry we see him in the white robes of the minstrel; with uptureed though sightless eyes, rapt in meditation at the feet of the heavenly muse. Bants, in his dark vision, descends to the depths of the world of perdition, and, homeless fugitivess he is, drage his proud and prosperous enemies down with him, and buries them, doubly destroyed, in the flaming sepulchres of the lowest heil. Milton, on the other hand, secure atmost to have purged off the dross of humanity. Blind, poor friepdiess, in solitude and sorrow, with quite as much reason as his Italian rival to repine at his fortune and sur against markind, how caim and unimpassioned is he in all that concerns his own personality! He deemed too highly of his divine gift to make it the instrument of limnortalizing his hatreds. One cry alone of sorrow at his blindness, one pathetic lamentadivine git to make it the instrument of immortalizing his harreds. One cry alone of sorrow at his blindness, one patholic lamentation over the evil days on which he had fallen, bursts from his full heart. There is not a flash of human wrath in all his pit tures of wos. Hating nothing but evil spirits, in the childlike simplicity of his heart, his pure hands undefiled with the pitch of the political intrigues in which he had lived, he breathes forth his inexpressibly majestic strains,—the poetry not so much of earth as heaven."—ROWARD EVERETT: Orations and Speeches, 1853, il. 222-223.

We have already given some extracts from an Essay on the Poetical Genius of Milton, by another distinguished American writer,-Dr. William Ellery Channing,-and commend the whole paper to the reader's perusal. Chanping considers

A Paradise Lost perhaps the noblest monument of human genius. The two first books, by universal consent, stand pre-eminent in sublimity. Hell and hell's kingdom have a terrible harmony, and dilate into new grandour and awfulness, the longer we contemplate them. From one element, 'solid and liquid fire,' the poet has framed a world of horror and suffering such as imagination has havest traversal." had never traversed.

"No cpic poet excites emotions so fervid as Homer, or possesses so much fire; but in point of sublimity he cannot be compared to Milton. . . The sublime has for its object the imagination only, and its influence is not so much to occasion any fervour of feeling as the calumess of fixed astonishment. If we consider the sublime has thus distinguished from every other quality. Milton will appear to possess it in an unrivalled degree; and here, indeed, lies the secret of his nower. The perusul of Homer implies us with an ardent sensibility, Milton with the stillness of surprise. The one fills and delights the mind with the confinence of various emotions; the other anazes with the vastness of his ideas. The movements of Milton's mind are steady and progressive; he carries the fancy through successive stages of clevation, and gradually increases the heat by adding fuel to the fire."—Rev. "If ever any poem was truly poetical, if ever any abounded with poetry, it is 'Paradies Lost.' What an expansion of facts from a small seed of history! What worlds are invented, what embellishments of nature upon what our senses present us with!

. The poem opens the fountains of knowledge, piery, and virtue, and pours along full streams of peace, comfort, and joy, to such as can penetrate the true sense of the writer and obediently listen to his song. In reading the Hiad or Encid we treasure up a collection of fine lunginative pictures, as when we read 'Paradies Lost,' only that from thence we have (to speak like a councisseur) more Rafacles, Corregios, Guidos, &c. Mitton's pictures are more sublime and great, divine and lively, than Homer's or Virgil's, or those of any other poet, ancient or modern."—JONATHAR RICHARDON.

"Throughout the whole of 'Paradies Lost' the author appears to have been a most critical reader and passionate admirer of the Holy Scripture: he is indebted to Scripture influitely more than to Homer and Virgil and all other books whatevar. Not only the principal fable, but all his episedes, are founded upon Scripture the Scripture has not only furnished him with the noblest hints, raised his thoughts, and fired his imagination, but has also very much aeriched his language, given a certain sulcamity and majesty to his diction, and supplied him with many of his choicest, happiest expressions. Let men, therefore, learn from this instance to revernee the Secred Writings: if any man can pretend to deride or despise them, it must be said of him, at least, that he has a taste and genius the most different from Milton's that can be imagined. Whoever has any true taste and genius, we are confident, will setteped and trembled at the dark confines, and of which the inhabitants might almost have mistaken blim, as to his intellectual grandeur, for one of themselves."—

How has Milton united power, and fear, and physical pang in yeat and dread sublimity, when he has shown those mighty fallon angels, in their yet unvanquished and seemingly indestructible strength, arraying thomselves to new war in the midst of their delorous dwellings of pain in the dark and flery dwelling-place of their sternal forment! . It is generally agreed that among the most successful parts of Puralise Lost are those which represent the character of the fallen angels; and yet these sublime and fragical sollinguise are founded chiefly on personal feeling, which, although it may be made a source of consummate pathos and dragate, hearty, is certainly not the region of the human mind from whence the highest possible impressions are to be drawn."—

"After I have been reading the Paralles Lost I can take up no other poet with satisfaction. I seem to have left the music of Hundel for the music of the streets, or, at bee's for drums and files. Although in Shakspeare there are occasional bursts of harmony no less sublime, yet if there were many such in continuation it would be hurtful, not only in comedy, but also in tragedy. The greater part should be equable and conversational. . . . My predilection in youth was on the side of Homer; for I had read the Iliad twice, and the Odyssea once, before the Paradise Lost. Averse as I am to every thing relating to theology, and especially to the view of it thrown open by this poem, I recur to it increasnily as the noblest specimen in the world of cloquence, harmony, and genius. . . If ever there was a poet who knew Nature well and described her in all her lovellness, it was Milton. In the Paradise Lost, how profuse in his descriptions, as became the time and place! in the Allegro and Penseroso, how oxquisite and select!"—W. S. LANDOR.

"A subject so remote from the affairs of this world may furnish ground, to those who think such discussions material, to bring it into doubt whether Paradiss Lost can properly be classed among opic pocus. By whatever name it is to be called, it is undoubtedly on of the highest efforts of poetical genius; and in one great characteristic of the opic poem, unjesty and sublinity, it is fully equal to any that bear that name. . . The subject which he has chosen suited the daring sublimity of his genius. It is a subject for which Vilton alone was fitted; and in the conduct of the has shown a stretch both of imagination and invention which is perfectly wonderful. It is astonishing how, from the few hints given us in the Sacred Scriptures, he was able to raise so complete and regular a structure and to fill his poem with such a variety of incidents. . . Milton's great and distinguishing excellence is his sublimity. In this, perhaps, he excels Homer,—as there is no doubt of his leaving Virgil and every other poet far behind him. . . Milton's sublimity is of a different kind from that of Homer, Homer's is generally accompanied with fire and impetuosity; Milton's possesses more of a calm and amazing grandeur. Homer warms and hurries as along; Milton fixes us in a state of astonishment and elevation. Homer's sublimity appears most in the description of actions, Milton's in that of wonderful and stupendous objects. But, though Milton is most distinguished for his subminity, et there is also much of the beautiful, the tender, and the pleasing, in many parts of his work. . . He discovers a vigour, a grasp of genius, equal to every thing that is great; if at some times he falls much below himself, at other times he rises above every poet of the ancient or modern world."—Blati's Lett. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. "Aware that his classical acquirements were so slender, men
all, of his composition. The solution of the difficulty lay in the constant reading of the old English authors to which he devoted himself. Shakspeare he was more familiar with than almost any man of his age; and Milton he nearly had by heart. Nor can it be denied that the study of the speeches in 'Paradise Lost' is as good a substitute as can be found for the immortal originals in the "Many other poets have excelled him in variety and versatility; but mone ever approached hitz in intensity of style and thought, in unity of purpose, and in the power and grandeur with which he piles up the single monument of genius to which his mind is for the time devoted. . . . The sublime is reached by other poets when they excel themselves and hover for a moment smides unusual brightyess; but it is Militon's native region. When he descends, it is to meet the greatness of others; when he soars, it is to reach heights unattainable to any but hinself. The two first books of 'Paradise Lost' are one continuous effort of intenes sublimity. I know of no spot, or blemish, or inequality, or falling off, from the beginning of the First Book to the close of the Second; and then how wonderfully fine is the contrast, when the Third Book opens with that infinitally pathetic address to Light, in which the poet aludes, with a pardonable egotism, to the calsmitty under which he is himself suffering:

"Hall, holy Light! offspring of Heaven first-born.

"' Hail, hely Light! offspring of Heaven first-born, Or of the Eternal co-eternal beam.'" science, and the most solenn mysteries of religion, were all explored by the greet author, and he poured out the whole vast treasure of his mind into the golden vase his imagination had formed."—Rev. H. Stemans : Memor of Millon.

"It was during a state of poverty, bilinders, disgrace, danger, and old age that Milton composed his wonderful poem, which not only surpassed all the performances of his contemporaries, but all the compositions which had flowed from his pen during the vigour of his age and the height of his prosperity. This circumstance is not the least remarkable of all those which attend that great shird of the work, almost shouly destrute of harmony and elegance, may, of all vigour of imagination. This natural inequality of Milton's genius was much increased by the inequalities in his subject; of which some parts are of themselves the most lefty that can enter into human conception; others would have required the most laboured elegance of composition to support them. —Hinnes' Hist, of England, Bowyers ed., 1806, 19, 1606, 607.

"Paradise Lost is the last great hervic poem that the world has seen,—perhaps the last that it will ever see. Putting Pante's poem askle for the present, we may assert that it is the only successful poem on a reli. lous subject; and it may be doubted if religion supplies any other theme for poetry than that which Milton selected.

If any form [of poetry] prevailed most in Milton's mind, we think it was the dramatic,—that is, such as it appeared on the theatre at Athena; and, had Milton flourished in anienity and directly and any other theme for poetry than that which Milton selected, this is the species of poetry to which he would have devoted himself, equalling, as we have said. E-chylus in sublimity and surpassing him in anienity: equaling Sophocles in amenity and derinty and surpassing him in sublimity and vigour, and not inferior to him in skilful arrangement. . The critics next to be quoted do not appear to agree in the opinion that the "interest of the poem declines as it madvances:"

"I wish the Paradise Lost were more carefully read and studied than I can see any ground for believing it is,—especially those parts which, from the habit of always looking for a story in poetry, are scarcely read at all,—as, for example. Adam's vision of future events, in the 14th and 12th backs. No one can rise from a perusal events, in the 14th and 12th books. No one can rise from a perusal of this immortal poem without a deep sense of the grandeur and purity of Milton's soul "—to Lendor."

Milton's poom ends very nobly. The last speeches of Adam and the archangel are full of moral and instructive sentiments. The sleep that fell upon Eve, and the effects it had in quieting the disorders of her mind, produce the same kind of consolation in the reader, who cannot peruse the last beautiful speech which is ascribed to the mother of mankind without a secret pleasure and satisfaction. The following lines, which conclude the poem, rise in a most glorious blaze of poetical images and expressions."—ADDISON.

ADDISON. In the concluding passage of the poem there is brought together, with uncommon strength of fancy and rapidity of narrative, a number of circumstances wonderfully adapted to the purpose of filling the nind with ideas of terrific grandeur;—the descent of the cherubin. the flaming sword; the archangel leading in haste our first parents down from the heights of Paradise, and then disappearing; and, above all, the scene that presents itself on their looking behind them:

They, looking back, all th' eastern side beheld Of Paradise, so late their happy seat, Waved over by that finning brand; the gate With dreadful faces throng'd and flery arms;

With dreadful faces throng d and flery arms: to which the remaining verses form the most striking contrast that can be imagined. The final couplet renews our sorrow, by exhibiting, with picture-sque accuracy, the most mouratul scene in nature: which yet is so prepared as to raise comfort and dispose to resignation. And thus, while we are at once melting in tenderness, elevated with pious hope, and overwhelmed with the grandeur of description, the divine poem concludes."—B. Barris. "A poem, however wonderfully pregnant with the delectars, will be wanting in its most essential part if it does not close with the senence or materially involve it. This, I much incline to believe, could not have been done in the present poem in a more judiclous, momentous, dignified, and truly poetical manner than that of our author."—Dussters.

And how it closes!—when the arrhangel waves the 'finning brand' over the eastern gate of Paradise, and on looking back, Adam and Eve saw the 'dreadful faces' and 'fiery arms' that throng' tround it! quoted in this article, and to other pages of our Dictionary:

"The Paradise Lost pariskes in all those difficulties and defects which, as I have said, attend all Christian poenus which attempt to make the mysteries of our religion the subjects of their fiction. It is strange that Milton did not observe that the loss of Paradise forms in itself no complete whole, but is only the first art of the great Christian history of man, wherein the creation, the fall, and the redemption are all equally necessary parts of one mighty drama. It is true that he sought afterwards to remove this main defect by the addition of the Paradise Regained: but this poem is too insignificant in its purpose and size to be worthy of forming the key-stone to the great work. When compared with the Catholic poets Dante and Taso, who were his models, Milton, as a Protestant, laboured under considerable disadvantages by being enturely defined the use of a great many symbolical representations, instories, and traditions which were in their bands the most graveful enaments of Christian poetry. He was sensible of this, and altempted to make amends for the defect by adopting fables and altempted to make amends for the defect by adopting fables and allegories out of the Koran and the Talmud, such as are extremely wind from the use of a Christian poet. The excellence of his epic work consists, therefore, not in the plan of the whole so much as in particular beauties and passages, and, in general, in the perfection of the high language of poetry."—Farderies Schedelt: Lects. on the Hist, of Fig., 1812.

"Milton, with his sublime genius, is in a certain point of view the most in regular of poets. For he not only departs from rules, but he casts them down with the strength of a giant and builds up a new poette world on their rules. For this reason, his wonderful poem cannot be assigned a place in any of the departments which are assually regarded as the only possible ones for postic creations. He takes at once into his great poette creations. He takes at once into his great poette creations. He takes at once into his great poette creat the whole of the four paradisal rivers of poetry,—the cpic, the lyric, the didactic, and the dramatic. It has therefore been justly observed that the proper object of the psem is didactic, as the poet will by means of it 'justify the ways of God to men.' It is epic merely by the greatness of the action and the episodes respecting the war in heaven. But the action used is dependent on the design and execution, and the main interest, from beganning to end, dwells about a single great tragic character.—the fallen archangel. Finally, the poem is lyric, not only in single passages, but even in general, in its whole tone and expression. Thus, then, the Pacudise Lost, in a poetic point of view, forms a species in itself, without a model, and as yet without a copy; but to think of rejecting it on this account would be to sactified the just rights of genius to the crothets of the schools. The power with which this wonderful proves the poverty of our ordinary poetic theories."—Earls Teories, Richop of Vezili, Sweden, author of the Erithiofs Sings: Remarks on Control Occasifernia's Translation of Paradise Lost. "On what occasions does the spirit of rage, the king of evil, after reflections which may be called wise? First, when contemplating the beauty of the carth: thirdly, in contemplating the beauty of the carth: contemplating one of these creatures alone, plating the beauty of the sun; secondly, in contemplating the beauty of the cartic thirdly, in contemplating the beauty of two beings who in peaceful converse assure each other of their nutual layer fourthly, in contemplating one of these creatures alone, among trees, cultivating flowers, the image of innocence and tranquility. All that is good and fair at first excites his admiration; this awaken remorse, by the remembrance of what he has lost, and the results of his remorse only harden him the more in crime. The king of eval by degrees becomes worthy of his new emples. Five gathering flowers appears to him happy; her sevenity is the pleasure of innocence; he hastens to destroy what he admires, because he is the destroyer of all happiness. In these four solliequies Milton has preserved the same character for Saian, without copying himself. Stata is not the hero of his poem, but the master-place of his poetry."—Lovis Racise.

PARABISE REGAINED.

It is to Ellwood, Milton's amiable Quaker friend, that we are indebted for this poem. On returning the MS, of Paradise Lost, of which the author had desired his perusal and judgment, he remarked,

"'Thou hast said much here of Paradise Lost; but what hast from to say of Paradise found?" He made me no answer, but sat some time in a muse, then broke off the discourse and fell upon

"After the sickness was over, and the city well cleaned and become safely habitable again, he returned thither; [the interview above togered to occurred at diles Chalfont, Milton's country-residence;] and when, afterwards, I went to wait on him there,—which I seldom failed of doing whenever my occasion led me to London.—he showed me his second poem, called Parathae Regained, and, in a pleasant tone, said to me," This is owing to you; for you put it into six head by the question you put to me at Chalfont, which before I had not thought of."

"In none of his works is his reading made so directly subservient to his end as in his Paradise Regained,—a poem arguing in its suther a more than common confidence in the exuberance of his own resources. It was a bold scheme, indeed, to undertake the structure to his end as in his Paradise Regained,—a poem arguing in its author a more than common confidence in the exuberance of his own prescurces. It was a bold scheme, indeed, to undertake the structure of even so short an epic as this out of the history of our Lord's temptation,—comprised as that history is in half a score verses of St. Matthew, and forbidding by its very nature any violent interference with recorded facts. Yet the imagination of Milton, duly exercised upon those elements with which his memory was stored, enabled him to expand his subject, without perfaming it, into a poem which had it been only an episcele (as it should have been would have borne a comparison with the happiest that have been written. Our Lord is 'an-hungered,' and, through that appetite, tempted of the devil. Narrow as this ground is, for Milton it is enough; and he farthwith raises a table in the wilderness, furnished from 'Pontus, and Lucrine lake, and Afric coast,' and the churming pipes are heard to play, and Arabjan dours and early flowers breathe around, and nymphs and naises of lians's train are summoned farth to dance beneath the shade, and the whole is combined into one of those sploudid banquets with which nothing but a most perfect knowledge of antiquity could have supplied him. Again, Satan takes 'the Saviour up into an exceeding high mountsin, and shows him the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them.' Then is the scholar awakened once more: the hint suffices to unlock the magazines of his loarning; the fountains of that great set anowers of antiquity could not supprised film. Again, set anowers the Saviour up into an exceeding high mountain, and shows him the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. Then is the scholar awakened once more: the hint suffices to unlock the magazines of his learning; the fountains of that great deep are broken up; and now the Parthians, with all their martial appointments and the evolutions peculiar to them, appear he fore us in the most faithful array; and now, in her turn, Rome, under Tiberius, is depleted with the spirit indeed of a port, but with the accuracy of a contemporary annalist; and her imperial palace, the houses of her gods, the conflux of divers nations and languages at her gates, the embassies from far crowding the Emilian and Appian cavels, the pretors and proconsuls hasting to their provinces or on their triumphant return. All fill the mind's eye, till it is again carried away 'to the westward,' and the flowery hill of Hymetius offers itself to our notice, and Athens, with its ploturesque suburbs, is unfidied with a perspicuity and precision that might challenge the most scrupulous critic to quarrel even with an epithet, (so true is Milton to his Grecian masters;) whilst her calconis of philosophy, the sects into which they are divided, the dogmas they severally espoused, all pass in rapid review, leaving us confounded at the mental plenitude of this extraordinary man,"—Rosser Sourker: Low. Quer. Rev., Xxxx, 1.5.-5.6.

"Of Paradies Rogalned' the general judgment seems now to be right, that it is in many parts elegant, and everywhere instructive, It was not to be supposed that the writer of 'Paradies Lost' could over write without great suffusions of fancy and exalted precepts of wisdom. The basts of 'Paradies Regained' is narrow: a dialogue without softou can never please like an union of the marrative and dramatic powers. Had this poon been written not by Milton, but by some imitator, it would have claimed and received universal pitales,"—Dr. Johnson's Alf. of Milton.

"Where are several of the minor poems of Milton on which we speaked willingly make a few semarks. Still more willingly would be sufer fixed a detailed examination of that admirable poem, the francise Regained, which, attracted enough, is exacted a very mentioned except asken instance of the blindness of the parental affected which they of bittory bear towards that offspring of their instance. We hasten on to that extraordinary preduction which the general matters of critics has placed in the bigheat class of human composition,"—Loan Macaular: Crit. and Histor. Busys, 1854, 1.7.

"They who talk of our author's genius being in the decline when he wrote his second poem, and would therefore turn from it as from a dry promit composition, are, I will venture to say, no judges of poetry. With a fancy such as Milton's, it must have been more difficult to forbear poetic decorations than to terrish them; and the glaring profusion of ornament would, I conceive, have know decidedly betrayed the poeta senecess than a want of it. . . . The 'Paradise Regained' has something of the didactic character: it teaches not merely by the general moral at d by the character and conduct of its hero, but has also many positive precepts everywhere interspersed. It is written, for the most part, in a style admirably condensed, and with a studied reserve of ornament: it is, nevertheless, illuminated with beauties of the most captivating kind. Its leading feature throughout is that 'excellence of composition' which, as Lord Monbodio justly observes, so enhantly distinguished the writings of the ancients, and in which, of all modern authors, Milton most resemblos them."—Dussyes.

"'Paradise Regained' has not met with the approbation that it seconposed in a lower and less striking style,—a style suide to the subject. Artful sophistry, false reasoning, set off in the most specious manner, and refuted by the Son of God with unaffected objuence, is the peculiar excellence of this poem."—Da, Joaziz.

"I am only surprised at the boldness of the poet in choosing this sublime theme. He could not have forescen all its difficulties; but, knowing his own perfect familiarity with the scriptural language, his gigantic mind hazarded the task. This alone i exple are very strong. The subject is so much less capable of ealining forth the vast powers of his mind that we should be unfair in comparing it throughout with the greater poem: it has been called a model of the shorter epic, as action comprehending few characters and a briof space of time. [Todd's Milton, vol. v. p. 108, note.] The love of Milton for dramatic diplogue, imbibed from Gresce, is still more apparent than in Paradise Lost: the whole poem, maket, may almost be accounted a drama of primal simplicity, the agreement and descriptive part serving rather to diversify and relieve the speeches of the actors, than their speeches, as in the legitimate opic, to enliven the narration. Paradise Regained abounds with passages equal to any of the same nature in Paradise Lost; but the argumentative tone is kept up till it produces some tectionsness; and perhaps, on the whole, less pains have been exerted to adorn and elevate that which appeals to the imagination "...Hallam's Lit. "Should a poet of lofter muse than Milton hereafter appear,—or, to speak more reverently, when the Milton of a better age shall arise,—there is yet remaining one subject worthy his powers,—the counterpart of 'Paradise Lost.' In the conception of this subject by Milton, then mature in the experience of his great poem, we have the highest human judgment that this is the one remaining theme. In his uncompleted attempt to achieve it we have the greatest cause for the doubt whether it be not beyond the grandest which can be contemplated by the mind of man, will never receive a practical illustration proportioned to its subhimity. It seems to me impossible that the time—perhaps far distant—should not eventually arrive when another Milton, divercing his heart from the delights of his, purifying his boson from its angry and its selfish passions, releved by happier fortunes from care and sorrows, pluming the wings of his spart in solitated by abstinence and prayer, will address himself to this only remaining theme of a great Christian cpic."—EDWARD EVERETT: Orations and Speeches, il. 223–224.

L'ALLEGRO AND IL PENSEROSO.

"Milton's lesser poems, indeed, (unaccountable as it may seem,) appear for a long while to have fallen into utter neglect; and the first attention paid to the Penseroso and Allegro by a writer of any note is in the Edoisa of Pope, where some remarkable expressions from those exquisite pieces are adopted without acknowledgment, and, perhaps, under the impression that to works so little known no acknowledgment was due. Even in a paper of The Spectator some lines are quoted by one of the correspondents as taken from a poom of Milton's which he entitles Il Penseroso,"—a form of speech which, as the context shows it not to be intended for something characteristic of the individual using it, argues the poem itself to have been but little read at the time. It is difficult to conceive a stronger proof of the gross depravity of taste which prevailed during the region of Charles II, than the simple fact that these two noble efforts of human imagination for a senson expired under its sensual influence:

ROBERT SOLTIMY: Low. Quar. Rev., xxxvi. 41.

"Of the two pieces 'L'Allegro' and 'II Penseroso', I believe opinion is uniform: every man that reads them reads them with pleasure. The author's design is not, what Theobald has remarked, merely to show how objects derive their culours from the mind by representing the operation of the same things upon the gay and melancholy temper, or upon the same man as he idifferently disposed, but rather how, among the successive variety of appearances, every disposition of mind takes hold on those by which it may be gratified. . . Through these two powns the images are properly selected and nicely distinguished; but the colours of the diction seem not sufficiently discriminated. I know not whether the characters are kept sufficiently apart. No mirth can, indeed, be found in his melancholy; but I am adrald that I always meet some melancholy in his mirth. They are two noble efforts of imagustion. "Dr. Johnson's Life of Millon.

"I Allegro' and 'II Penseroso' may be called the two first descriptive poems in the English language. It is perhaps true that the characters are not sufficiently kept apart;, but this circumstance has been productive of greater excellencies. It has been semarked, 'No mirth, indeed, can be found in his melancholy; but I am adrald I always meet some melancholy in his mirth. Milton's is the dignity of mirth; his cheerfulness is the cheerfulness of gravity; the objects he selects in his 'L'Allegro' are so argay as they do not naturally excite sadness; laughter and joility safe named only as personifications, and never excending in general lawring, and crantes, and wanton whice' are enumerated only in general lawring, and crantes, and wanton whice' are enumerated only in general lawring, and crantes, and wenton whice 'are enumerated only in gener trations as minister matter for new postry and gorulus description. Even his most brilliant imagery is mellowed with the school have of philosophic meditation. It was impossible for the nation of 'll Penneroso' to be more cheerful or to paint mirth with levity—that is, otherwise than in the coloure of the higher postry. Both poems are the result of the same lectings and the same habits of thought."—Dr. Joseph Warves.

"Of these two exquisite little poems I think it clear that the last is the most taking,—which is owing to the suiject. The mind delights most in these solemn images, and a genius delights most to paint them."—Bismor Hunn.

"They were written in the buoyancy and joyonsness of youth, though the joyonsness of the latter is pensive. All was yet hope with the poet; nome of the cvit of life had yet come upon him. It was the joy of mental display and visionary glory, of a mind proudly displaying its own riches and throwing from its treasures beams of light on all external objects; but it was the rapidly of a ferment too much in motion to allow it to wait long enough on particular topics; therefore there was in these two productions less intensity than in most of the author's other poetry; lie is here generally content to describe the surface of what he moloce His learned allusions abound, though not so much, perhaps, as it most of his other writings; these, however, are not the proofs of his genius, but only of his memory and industry. I admit that the choice of the imagery of these pieces could only have been made by a true poot, of nice discernment and brilliant foncy, of a mind constantly occupied by contemplation and skillul in making mae of all those supervitions in which note leads a beautiful and alpendic constalistion; still, a large portion of the ingredients, taken separately, have been anticipated by other poets."—Six 8. The collection of gay images on the one hand and of melancholy ones on the other, exhibited in these two small but infinitely fine poems, are as exquisite as can be conceived. They are, indeed, the storehouse where many succeeding posts have enriched their descriptions of similar subjects; and they alone are sufficient for illustrating the observations which I made concerning the proper selection of cheumstances in descriptive writing. Take, for instance, the following passage from the Penseroso.

"It is a great heauty in Militon's Allegro that it he all alive and full of persons."—Bluir's Lects. on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres, Lect. XL.

"The Allegro and Penseroso are perhaps more familiar to us than any part of the writings of Militon. They satisfy the critics and they delight mankind. The choice of images is so judicious, their succession so rapid, the allusions are so various and plensing, the leading distinction of the pooms is so felicitously maintained, the versification is so animated, that we may place them at the head of that long series of descriptive poems which our language has to boast. It may be added, as in the greater part of Militon's writings, that they are sustained at an uniform pitch, with few blemistics of expression and scarce any facebleness,—a striking curtrast, in this respect, to all the contemporaneous poetry, except, perhaps, that of Waller. Johnson has thought that, while there is mirth in his melancholy, he can detect some melancholy in his mirth. This seems to be too strongly put; but it may be said that his Allegro is rather cheerful than pay, and that even his choerfulness is not always without effort. In these posms he is indebted to Fietcher, to Burton, to Browne, to Wither, and probably to more of our early versifiers: for he was a great collector of sweets from these wild flowers."—Hullan's Lit. Hull, of Europe, 4th ed., 1845, ill. 48.

"We find nowhere in his writings that whining sensibility and exaggeration of morbid feeling which makes so much of moderfi poetry effeminating. If he is not gay, he is not spirit-broken. Cours.

The origin of the Masque of Comus is thus related by Warton, on the authority of a MS, of Oldys's. The Earl of Bridgewater, who was in 1631 appointed Lord-President of Wales and the Marches, took up his official residence at Ludlow Castle, in Salop, in the autumn of 1631, (the year in which Milton presented his friend Lawes with the Arcades :)

Arcades:)

"On this occasion he was attended by a large concourse of the neighbouring nobility and centry. Among the rest came his children,—in particular, Lord Brackley, Mr. Thomas Egerton, and Lady Alice. They had been on a visit at a honse of their relations, the Egerton family, in Herefordshire, and, in passing through Haywood Forest, were benighted, and the Lady Alice was even bost for a hort time. This accident—which in the end was attended with no bad consequences—furnished the subject of a mask for a Michaelmas fostivity, and produced Comus. Lord Bridgewater was appointed Lord-President, May 12, 1833. When the perilous adventure in Haywood Forest happened, if true, cannot now be told: it must have been soon after. The mask was acted at Michaelmas, 1634."

"We must confess," remarks Mr. Keightley, "that we certainly feed inclined to regard this tale of the Children of the Wood as somewhat apocryphal and as being founded on Comus. At all events, it must have occurred, not in 1633, but a short time before the representation of the Mask, in the prologue to which it is said,
"His fair offspring, nursed in princely lore,

'llis fair offspring, uursed in princely lore, And coming to attend their father's state And new-entrusted sceptre.'

This would seem to prove that it was their first visit to Ludlow; and it is most probable that the Mask had been prepared and learned by the young actors at Hardeld, and was presented by them on their arrival at Ludlow Castle.

"The origin of Connes would appear to have been as follows," &c.—Life, &c. of Millon, 279-280, q. v.

What the origin of Comus may have been is a matter of but little moment; but its exquisite—almost unearthly—beauty is so far beyond all question that he who can read it without being warned by the most ardent admiration must (as Dr. Johnson says on another occasion) "rendunce all pretensions to taste or sensibility." Thus much may we say regarding its inception, that Dryden declared to the Education (Miller Research and Control of the Con declares, (Preface to the Fables,) "Milton has acknowledged to me that Fletcher was his original." It is not to be It is not to be doubted also that the verses of Browne, Wither, Burton, Drummond, and others of this school were familiar to the great poet; but it is ever to be remembered that nothing is more groundlessly alleged, more carelessly believed, and with more difficulty disproved, than the oft-repeated charge of literary imitation. There is no branch of school-boy criticism which has been so industriously cultivated, or which is held in more general contempt by the really learned. Literary resemblances are, of course, unavoidable: they who describe the same objects must of necessity often employ the same imagery and at times very nearly the same language. To trace these resemblances in a library and accounted the libra blances in a liberal and congonial spirit is a pleasant pastime for ingenuity, and gratifies a not ignoble curiosity; but to couple passages which bear a real or supposed like-ness for the sake of proving unfair imitation or criminal plagiarism is sometimes, indeed, the proper office of legitimate criticism, but more frequently the error of uncon-scious ignorance or the contemptible device of petty But we must hasten to our citations:

Prefixed to the first edition of Milton's Poems, in 1645. were a letter from the author's friend, Henry Lawes, to "Lord-Viscount Bracly," and a letter from "Sir Henry Wootton to the Author," 13th of April, 1638. From each of these we extract a few lines:

of these we extract a few lines;
"My Loap:
"This poem, which received its first occasion of birth from yourself and others of your noble family, and much honour from your ewn person in the performance, now returns again to make a finall dedication of itself to you. Although not openly acknowledged by the author, yet it is a legitimate offspring, so lovely, and so much desired, that the often copying of it hath tired my pen to give my severall friends satisfaction, and brought me to a necessity of producing it to the publike view, and now to offer it up in all rightful devotion to those fair hopes and rare endowments of your nuch-promising youth, which gave a full assurance, to all that knew you, of a future excellence."
"Since your going," remarks Sir Henry Wooton, "yon have charged ne with new obligations, both for a very kinde letter from you, dated the sixth of this month, and for a charity plece of entertalment (Conna) which came therewith,—wherein I should much commend the tragical part if the lytical did not ravish me with a certain Dorique delicacy in your songs and odes; where unto I must plainly confess to have seen nothing parallel in our language."

The criticism was just," remarks Lord Macaulay, "It is when Milton escapes from the shackles of the dialogue, when he is discharged from the labour of uniting two incongruous styles, when he is at liberty to indulge his choral ruptures without reserve, that he rises even above himself. Then, like his own good genius bursting from the earthly form and weeds of Thyreis, he stands forth in celestial freedom and beauty; he seems to cry, exultingly, "Now my task is smoothly done:

to skim the earth, to soar above the clouds, to bathe in the clyslan dew of the rainbow, and to inhale the balmy smells of mard and cassla which the musky winds of the zephyr scatter through the cedared alleys of the Hesperides. . . . The Comus is framed on the model of the Italian Masque, as the Samson is framed on the model of the Greek Tragedy. It is certainly the noblest performance of the kind which exist in any language. It is as far superior to the Faithful Shepherdess as the Faithful Shepherdess is to the Aminta, or the Aminta to the Pastor Eido. It was well for Milton that he had here no Euripides to mislead him. . Milton attended in the Comus to the distinction which he afterwards neglected in the Samson. He made his Masque what it ought to be.—essentially lyrical, and dramatic only in semblance. He has not attempted a fruitless struggle against a defect inherent in the nature of that species, and has therefore succeeded wherever success was not impossible. The speeches must be read as majestic sollioquies; and ho who so reads them will be enraptured with their cloquence, their sublimity, and their music. The interruptions of the diadogue, however, impose a restraint upon the writer and break the filusion of the reader. The finest passages are those which are lyric in form as well as in spirit. I should much commend, says the excellent Sir Henry Wotton, [unctation continued above]"—Criv. and Hist. Essays, 1854, 1.15, 10, 17.

signification of the light authority of Dr. Johnson, I am of opinion that this enchanting poem, or pustoral drama, is both gracefully splendid and delightfully instructive."—Tops. 1-20 Dr. Johnson is more inclined to be favourable to 'Connus' than to any other poem of Milton: he begins fairly enough, and gives it some of the praises which justly belong to it; but he gradually returns to file captions ill-humour, and ends with saying that it is 'inelegantly splendid and tediously instructive.' After this close, what is the value of his praise? If it is truly poetical it contains the health of his praise? If it is truly poetical it contains place in this music, it contains not a single image or epithet which does not fill the reader of taste with delight: it contains also passion, but he did not intend it. Masks were always designed to play with the fancy; and from beginning to end, without together. . . Comus is the invention of a beautiful fable, enriched with shadowy beings and visionary delights: every line and word is pure poetry, and the sentiments are as exquisite us the images. It is a composition which no pen but Milton's could have produced. . . The songs of this poem are of a singular felicity: they are unbroken strains of exquisite imagery, either imaginative or descriptive, with a dance of numbers which sounds like aerial music,—for instance, the lady's song to Echo. . . The more we study this poem the more pleasure we shall find in it: it illuminates and refines our fancy, and enables us to discover in rural scenery new delights and to distinguish the features of each object with a clearness which our own sight would not have given us: it presents to us those associations which improve our intellect and spiritualize the material joys of our sensor. The effect of poetical language is to convey a sert of internal lustre which puts the mind in a blaze: it is like bringing a bright lamp to a dank chamber. . . It is worthy of remark with what admirable skill the poet gathered from all his predecessors—Sp inodern. The conduct of the piece is answerable to the beginning, and the versification of it is finely varied by short and long verses, blank and rhyming, and the sweetest songs that ever were composed. As to the style of 'Comus', it is more elevated. I think than that of any of his writings, and so much above what is written at present, that I am inclined to make the same distinction in the English language that Homer made of the Greek in his time, and to say that Milton's language is the language of the gods, whereas we of this age speak and write the language of mere mortal men."—LORD MONIDODO.

"In poetical and picture-spie circumstances, in wildness of fancy and imagery, and in weight of scuttment and moral, how greatly does 'Comus' excel the 'Aninto' of Tasso and the 'Pastor Fide' of Guarini, which Milton, from his love of Italian poetry, must frequently have read! 'Comus,' like these two, is a pastoral draina; and I have often wondered it is not mentioned as auch."

"Comus was sufficient to couriece any one of taste and feeling that a great poet had arisen in England, and one partly formed in a different school from his contemporaries. Many of them had produced highly beautiful and imaginative passages; but none had sevinced so classical a judgment, none had aspired to so regular a prefection. Jonson had learned much from the succents; but there was a grace in their best models which he did not quite attain. "In Comus, the Allegro and Penseroso, and the religious odes, we see all this power of the imagination operating, but producing only beautiful and holy forms; we are entertained with the sight of nature suffused with heavenly light, with the discourse of brights and spiritual beings, and with the view of past secues over which langs the cloud of divine glory. "Miton's 'Juvenile Poems' are so no otherwise than as they were written in his younger years: for their dignity and excellence they are sufficient to have set him among the most celebrated of the poets, even of the ancients themselves: his 'Mask' and 'Lychdas' are, perhaps, superior to all in their several kinds."—JONATHAN RICHARDOON.

LYCIDAS.
This is a monody, written in November, 1637, which first appeared in a Cambridge collection of verses, 1638, 4to, on the death of Edward King, Fellow of Christ's College, who was drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish seas, August 10, 1637. All on board the vessel found a watery grave. King was twenty-five years of age,—was distinguished for his piety and learning, and greatly lamented by his college-companions, among whom was Milton. The volume referred to contains three Greek, nineteen Latin, and thirteen English poems. For no part of his critical writings has Johnson been so much consured as for his strictures on this poem: he will allow it no merit of any kind, and is not at any pains to conceal the vehement of any kind, and is not at any pains to conceal the velocent disgust which accompanies every stroke of his pen.

"One of the penus," he commences, "on which much praise has been hestowed, is 'Lycidas,' of which the diction is harsh, the rhymes uncertain, and the numbers unpleasing. What beauty there is we must, therefore, seek in the sentiments and finages, It is not to be considered as the effusion of real passion; for passion runs not after remote allusions and obscure opinions. Passion plucks no berries from the myrtic and try, nor calls upon Arsthuse and Mineus, nor tells of rough satyrs and fauns with closes heat. Where there is leisure for fiction there is little grief.

"In this poem there is no mature, for there is nothing new. Its form is that of a pastoral,—easy, valgar, and therefore disquisting: whatever images it can supply and long ago exhausted, and its inherent improbability siways forces disscribation on the mind.

This poem has yet a grosser fault. With these trifling fictions are mingled the most awful and sucred truths, such as ought herear to be polluted with such irreverent combinations. The shepherd,

"Such is the power of reputation justly acquired, that its blaze drives away the eye from nice examination. Surely no man could have fancied that he read 'Lyckide, with pleasure had he not known its author."—Life of Milton.

"It has been said that this is not the natural mode of expressing passion; that where it is real its language is less figurative; and that 'where there is leisure for fiction there is little grief.' In general, this may be true; in the case of Milton, its truth may be doubted... The mind of Milton was perfect fairy-land; and every thought which entered into it, whether grave or gay, magnificent or mean, quickly partick of a fairy form... There is no universal language of grief. It takes its complexion from the country, the age, the individual. In its parexysmis no one thinks of writing verses of any kind; then the rlymes of a builed-singer would be as much out of place as the strains of a Theoritus. We exclaim, as King David does. 'My son' my son!' When the prayers in spast every man will write such verses (if he write them at all) as the ordinary turn of his mind dictates. Bishop Andrews said his prayers in Greek: who would on that account dony that the poet's sorrow was unfeigned! Monact and speak under suffering agreeably to the manner in which they act and speak under suffering agreeably to the manner in which they act and speak ing general. Clearo was, by habit, a reader and writer of plays; and therefore, when his daughter dies he gives vent to his gr

the phord has test his companion, and miss feed his flocks alone, without any judge of his skill in piping; but fillion dignifies and addras these common artificial incidents with mexpected touches of pictareque beauty, with the graces of seathment, and with the predicties of original genius. It is objected, 'Here is no act; for there is nothing new.' To say nothing that there may be art without movelty, as well as noveling without art, I must reply that this shjection will vanish if we offisider the imagery which Mitton has reased from local circumstances."—Thomas Waaron.

"The rhymes and numbers which Dr. Johnson condemns appear to me as entinent proofs of the poot's judgment, exhibiting, in their varied and arbitrary disposition, an case and gracefulness which infinitely exceed the formal couplets or alternate rhymes of modern elegy. Lamenting also the prejudice which has pronounced 'Lycidas' to be vulgar and disgusting, I shall never cesse to consider this monody as the swest effusion of a nost poet and tender mind,—entitled, as well by its beautiful melody as by the frequent grandeur of its sentiments and language, to the utmost entausiasam of admiration."—Tode.

"Of all Mitton's smaller poems, Lycidas is the greatest favourite with me. I cannot agree to the charge which Dr. Johnson has brought against it of pedantry and want of feeling. It is the first sunantion of classical sentiment in a youthful scholar,—'most musicol, most melancholy!" A certain tender gloon overspreads it, a wayward abstraction, a forgotulness of his subject in the serious relications that arise out of it. The gusts of passion come and go like the sounds of music borne on the wind. The loss of the tribudy whose death he laments seems to have recalled, with double force, the reality of those speculations which they had included together: we are transported to classic ground, and a myterious strain steals responsive on the ear while we listen to the pet

'with eager thought warbling his Dario lay.'

. . The passage which alludes to the clerical character of Lycidas has been found fault with, as combining the truths of the Christian religion with the fiction of the heathen. I conceive there is very little foundation for this objection, either in reason or in good tasts. . . . Dr. Johnson's general remark, that Milton's genius had not room to show itself in his smaller pieces, is not well founded. Not to monition Lycidas, the Allegro and Pracerasa, it proceeds in a false estimate of the merits of his great work, which is not more distinguished by strength and sublimity than by tenderness and beauty. The last were as essential qualities of Milton's mind as the first."—Haulit's Lects. on the English Inets, Appendix.

Appendix.
"Whatev "Whatever stern grandeur Milton's two epies and his drama—written in his latter days—exhibit, by whatever divine invention they are created, 'Lyoldas' and 'Comus' have a finency, a sweetness, a melody, a youthful freshness, a dewy brightness of description, which those gignuite poems have not. It is true that 'Lycidas' has no deep grief; its clouds of sorrow are everywhere pierced by golden rays of a splendid and joyous imagination; the ingredients are all postical, even to singlet words; the epithets are all picturesque and fresh; and the whole are combined into a splendid tissue, as new in their position as they are radiant in their union. The unexpected transitions from one to the other at once surprise and delight: they are like the heavens of an antumnal evening when they are lighted up by electric flames. The outrasts of sorrow, and hope, and glory, keep us in a state of mingleal excitement to the end; the imagery never flags, though it bisses with the most beautiful forms of inanimate nature and alt sorts of pastoral pictures; yet the whole are, by some spell or other, made intellectual and spirited: they do not play merely upon the mirror of his functor. r stern grandeur Milton's two epies and his drams

It strikes me that there is no poem of Milton in which the pastoral and raral imagery is so breathing, so brilliant, and so new as in this: the tone which has most similitude to it is that of some discriptive passages of Shakspeare, whose simple brightness and modulation of words seem always to have dwelt on Milton's Whetever is obviously incongruous, whatever shocks our previous knowledge of possibility, destroys to a certain extent that acquiescence in the faction which it is the true business of the faction to ground the same in such poems as Lyctas. They pretend to no credibility; they aim at no illusion; they are read with the willing abandonment of the imagination to a waking dream, and require only that general possibility, that combination of images, which common experience does not reject as incompatible, without which the fancy of the post would be only like that of the lunadix And it had been so usual to blend secred with mythological personages in allegory, that no one probably in Milton's age would have been struck by the objection."—Hallam's Lit. "The particular beauties of this charming pastoral are too striking to need much descan ing on; but what gives the greatest grace to the whole is that natural and agreeable wildness and irregularity which run quite through it, than which nothing could be better suited to express the warm affection which Milton had for his friend, and the extreme grief he was in for the loss of him. Oricle is elequent, but not formal."—Thy.a.

"The previous rhyme in Milton's 'Lycidas' is very frequently placed at such a distance from the following that it is often dropt by the memory (much better employed in attending to the sentiment) before it be brought to join its partner; and this seems to be the greatest objection to that kind of versification. But then the peculiar case and variety it admits of are no doubt sufficient to overhalance the objection and give it the preference to any other in an elegy of length."—Shenstone: Account.

SAMSON AGONISTES.

"The nephew of Milton [Phillips] has told us that he could not ascritain the time when this drama was written; but it probably flowed from the heart of the indignant poet soon after his spirit had been wounded by the calamitous destiny of his friends, to which he alludes with so much energy and pathos in the chorus, line 652, &c. He did not design the drama for a theatre, nor has it the kind of action requisite for theatrical interest; but in one point of view the 'Samson Agonistes' is the most singularly affecting composition that was ever produced by sensibility of heart and vigour of imagnation. To give it this particular effect we must remember that the lot of Milton had a marvellous coincidence with that of his hero in three remarkable points: first, (but we should regard this as the most inconsiderable article of resemblance,) be had been tormented by a beautiful but disaffectionate and disadedient wite; secondly, he had been the great champion of his country, and, as such, the idol of public admiration; lastly, he had been the most humiliating reverse of fortune. In delineating the greater part of Samson's sensations under calamity he had only to describe his own. No dramatist can have ever conformed so literally to the Horatian precept, St. vis. me flere, &c.,—if you wish me to ween yourself-it and if in reading the greater part of Sameon's semastions under calamity he had only to describe his own. No dramatist can have ever conformed so literally to the Horatian precept, St via me fere, &c.,—If you wish me to weep, you must first weep yourself;' and if in reading the 'Samson Agonistes' we observe how many passages, expressed with the most energetic sensibility, exhibit to our tancy the sufferings and real sentiments of the poet, as well as those of his hero, we may derive from this extraordinary composition a kind of pathetic delight that no other drama can afford: we may appland the felicity of genus that contrived in this manner to relieve a heart overburdened with anguish and indignation, and to pay a half-concealed yet hallowed tribute to the memories of dear though dishonoured friends, whom the state of the times allowed not the afflicted poet more openly to deplore."—HATLER.

"Samson Agonister's is the only tragedy that Milton finished, though he sketched out the plans of several, and proposed the subjects of more, in his manuscript preserved in Trinity College, Cambridge: and we may suppose that he was determined to the choice of this particular subject by the similitude of his own circumstances to those of Samson—bind, and among the Philistines. This I conceive to be the last of his poetical pieces; and it is written in the very spirit of the ancients, and equals, if not exceeds, any of the most perfect tragedies which were ever exhibited as the Athenian stage when Greece was in its glory. As this work was never intended for the stage, the division into acts and scenes is omitted. Bishop Atterbury had an intention of getting Pope to divide it into acts and scenes, and of having it stage in the form of an oratoric; and Hantel's music is never employed to greater advantage than when it is adapted to Milton's words. That great artist has done equal justice to our author's L'Allegre and il Pfageron—as if the same spirit possessed both masters, and as if the gad of music and of verse was still one and the same."—Ba

"The excellence of this drama, which strictly follows the Greek model, lies principally in its majestic moral strength: the two preceding poems [Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained] are divine epics; this deals entirely in topics of human pature and human manners. It is not adapted to exhibition on the stage; it is too didactic, and has too few actors and too few incidents. The fibre, the characters, the sentiments, and the language are all admirably preserved; the story does not linger, as some have pretended, but goes forward with intense interest to the end. The opening if in the chastost style of postend beauty. The breath of heaven fresh-blowing gives case to Samson's body, but not to his mind, which, when in solitude and at leisure, agonties his beart with which. Nothing can be more pathetic than the comparison of his greenst failen state with his early hopes and past glories; and than the reflection that for this change he had no one to blame but himself.

The observations of the Chorus, descriptive of Samou's dejected appearance in this situation, are very fine, contrasing with the recollection of his former nighty actions and triumphs. . . The dislogues between Samous and his father are everywhere supported with force, ejevation and moral wisdom; and the unexampled singlicity of the language in which they are conveyed augments the deep imprecision which they everywhere make.

Perhaps, as a summary of divine dispensations, acthing even its, Milton can be found so awful and comprehensive. Then lurets birth, at line 667, that complaint of most deep and stupendous elequence, beginning.

"God of our fathers, what is man?"

*Then enters Dallish, with the renewal of all her arts and co-quetries and false smiles. With what a proud and overwhelming soon does the hero treat her insidious advances! What a contrast is Dallish to Eve, ever when like Eve to Adam, she affects to own her transgrossion! . . As the dialogue goes on, each party speaks in that untural strain which leads to the consummation of the tragedy, and with a poetic force and pleutinde of rich sentiment which belong to Milton alone.

All neatry of a high parier is produced by a union of all the tragedy, and with a postic force and plenitude of rich sentiment which belong to Milton alone.

"All poetry of a high order is produced by a union of all the best faculties of the mind and all the noblest cunotions of the heart. What is called the understanding or reason alone will produce no poetry at all: even the imagination added to it will not be sufficient unless there be sentiment and pathes raised by what imagination presents. To supply the materials of that imagination there must be observation, knowledge, learning, and memory. In the amagination of all these Milton's drama excels.

"The character of Samson Agonistes is magnificently supported. He speaks always in a tone becoming his circumstances, his position, his sufferings, and his destiny: every thing is grand, aslumated, natural, and soul-chaing. . . The character of Manosh, Samson's father, is nature and parental affection. The Chorus is everywhere attractive,—by pastry, moral wisdom, and eloquent pathos. I will not disguise my opinion that the versulcation of these lyrical parts is occasionally—and only occasionally—inharmonious, abrupt, and harsh, and such as my ear can scarcely resonctic to any sort of metre. . . The sudden pressage which prompted Samson to consent to exhibit himself in the theatre, after the sterm rejuctance be had previously exhibited, is very subprompted Samson to consent to exhibit number in the theatre, after the stern reductance he had previously exhibited, is very sublime. The tone of the whole druma is in the highest degree of elevation: the thoughts, sentiments, and words are these of a mental giant. Added to the midthy interest which these create is the conviction that through the whole the poet has a relation to his own case,—his blindness, his proscription, his poverty, his brittade, his defiance, his unimpaired strength, his loftiness of soul, his conscious power from the vastness of his intellect and the firmness of his principles."—Six S. Ederton Baynors.

"The utmost severity of thought and diction is observable in this drama. There are no vagaries of fancy, no symptoms of an unbridled imagination. In thought, expression, sentiment, it is Greek, Attic Greek,—tinged, however, with that solemn and unearthly character which it drives from the sacred nature of its subject. Both dramas (Samson and Conus) are worthy of the author of 'Paradise Lost,' "—Henry Niele's Lect. on Eag. Phetry, Lect. 1V.

"We have always regarded this as a noble poem, the swansong of a nighty genus. In the eye of criticism free from pedantry, its defects must, we should think, be hardly appreciable. Throughout it has the force and dignity of Kechylus, and at times it exhibits the majorty and sweetness of Suphocles. Had Milton Sourished in ancient Atticu, he had surely ranked with these mighty poets, milder and sweeter than the former, grander and spore elevated than the latter."—Keighiley's Life, de. of Multon, 324.

"If 'Paradise Regalued' has been too much depreciated, 'Samson Agonistes' has, in requital, been too much admired. It could pally be by long prejudice and the bigotry of learning that Milton could prefer the ancient tragedies, with the encumbrance of a chorus, to the exhibitions of the French and English stages: and it is only by a blind confidence in the reputation of Milton 'Shat a drama can be praised in which the internediate purts have neither cause nor consequence, neither hasten nor retard the

At all event, there has be no doubt that this veneration for the Athenian, whether just or not, was injurious to the Samson Agonists.... We are by no means insensible to the merits of this celebrated plece, to the severe dignity of the style, the graceful and pathetic solemnilly of the opening speech, or the wild and barbario melody which gives so striking an effect to the choral passages; but we think it, we confess, the least successful effort of the genius of Milton."—Teah Madvutar: Cut. and Histor. "Samson Agonistes is the latest of Milton's poema: we see in it, perhaps more distinctly than in farnatise Regained, the eth of a mighty tide. An air of uncommon grandeur prevalls throughout, but the language is iese poetical than in Paradise Lost; the vigour of thought remains, but it wants much of its ancient elequence. Nor is the lyric tone well kept up by the chorus; they are too sententious, too slow in movement, and except by the metro, are not easily distinguishable from the other personages. But this metre is itself infelicitous: the lines, being frequently of a number of syllables not recognized in the mage of English poetry, and destitute of rhythmical measure, fall into prose. Milton seems to have forgotten that the ancient chorus had a musical accompaniment. . . . It is, perhaps, not very popular even with the lovers of poetry; yet, upon close comparison, we should find that it deserves a higher place than many of its prototypes. We might seem the Grock tragedies long for a character so powerfully conceived and maintained as that of Samson himself; and it is but conformable to the sculptural simplicity of that form of drama which Milton adopted that all the rest should be kept in subordina tion to it."—Hallam's Lit. "When it is recollected that this piece was produced by the author at the age of twenty-one, all deep thinkers of fancy and sensibility must pore upon it with delighted wonder. The vigour, the grandeur, the imagicaliveness of the conception, the force and maturity of language, the bound, the gathering strength, the thundering roll of the metry, the largeness of the views, the extent of the 'learning, the solemn and avail, done, the cuthusiasm and a certain spell in the epithets, which puts the reader into a state of mystorious excitoment, may be better but the native of the bard's divine epics are exhibited in this poem; but it has several peculiarities which distinguish it from the poet's other compositions: It is more truly lyrical; the stanza is beautifully constructed; and there is a solemnity, a grandeur, and a swell of verse which is magical. . . . I venture to pronounce this poem far superfor to the 'L'Allegro' and 'Il Penserosa', though the popular taste may not concur with me: It is much deeper, much more original, and of a nobler cast of materials. We offer no particular criticism on it, for it is, in effect, nearly all breaty."

"The Ode on the Nativity, far less popular than most of the poetry of Milion, is perhaps the finest in the English language. A grandeur, a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout it. SONNETS.

"The 'Sonnets' were written in'different parts of Milton's life, upon different occasions. They deserve not any parketalge criticism; for of the best it can only be said that they are not bed; and perhaps the eighth and twenty-first are truly entitled to this slender commendation. The fabric of a somet, however adapted to the Italian language, has never succeeded in ours, which, having greater variety of termination, requires the rhymes to be often changed. Those little pieces may be despatched without much anxiety."—Johnson's Life of Milton.

Johnson has been impotent to fix the public taste in this instance, as in his other criticisms on the smaller poems of the author of Paradise Lost. These Sonnets are indeed unequal: the expression is sometimes hard, and sometimes obscure; sometimes too much of pedantic allusion interferes with the sentiment; nor am I reconciled to his frequent deviations from the best Italian structure. But such blemishea, are lost in the majectic simplicity, the holy caim, that ennoble many of those short compositions."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1864, Ili. 48-49.

pathetic and exalted; others are moral and axiomatic, and others descriptive. . . . The question at present is not whether the Sonnets are squal to Milton's genius, but whether they are good, or as contemptible as Johnson makes them. I say that they are such as mone but Milton could have written: they are full of lofty thought, moral instruction, and virtuous sentiment, expressed in language as strong as it is plain. They are pictures of a manly, resolute, indexible spirit, and aid us in our knowledge of the poet's individual character; and, if any one can read them without both pleasurable excitation and improvement, he has a sort of mind which it would be vain to attempt to cultivate,—a burren soll, or one overgrown with weeds and prindices. . . Of all the Sonnets of Milton, I am most inclined to prefer that 'On his Blindness,' It has, to my weak taste, such various excellencies as I am unequal to praise sufficiently. It breathes doctrines at once so divine and consolatory as to gid the gloomy paths of our existence here with a new and singular light."—Sin & Eczaron Bayden.

. "Tracers, indeed, of the peculiar character of Milton may be found in all his works; but it is most strongly displayed in the Somets. Those remarkable poems have been undervalued by critics who have not understood their nature. They have no epigrammatic point. There is none of the ingenuity of Filicaja in the thought, none of the hard and brilliant enamel of Petrarch in the style. They are simple but undestic records of the feelings of the post, as little tricked out for the public eye as his diary would have been. A victory, an expected attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited attack upon the city, a momentary fit of depression or excited at the Characterist that because which, without effort, shaped themselves into verse. The unity of sentiment and severity of style which characterists these little pieces remind us of the Greek Anthology, or perhaps still more of the Collects of the English Litury. The noble poem on the massacres of Piedmont is strictly a Collect in verse.

"The Somets are more or less striking according as the occasions which gave birth to them are more or less interesting. But they are, almost without exception, dignified by a sobriety and greatness of mind to which we know not where to look for a parallel."—Lord Magaulax: Crit. and Histor. Essays, 1854, i. 28–29.

The celebrated "Trinity Manuscript," as it is called, bequeathed to the Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, by Sir Henry Newton Puckering, contains Arcades, Comus, Lycidas, Ode on Circumcision, At a Solemn Music, On Time, and seven Sonnets in Milton's own hand, and six Sonnets in different female hands. It contains also a copious list of subjects for the drama, and two copies of a letter written at Cambridge in November, 1631, in Milton's handwriting. LATIN POEMS.

"I once heard Mr. Hampton, the translator of Polybius, remark—what I think is true—that Milton was the first Englishman who, after the revival of letters, wrote Latin verses with classic elegance. If any exceptions can be made, they are very few. Haddon and Ascham, the pride of Elizabeth's reign, however they have succeeded in prose, no sooner attempt verses than they provoke derision. If we produced any thing worthy of notice before the elegies of Milton, it was perhaps Alabaster's Roxana."—

Johnson's Life of Milton.

"But we must at least except some of the hendecasyllables and epigrams of Leland, one of our first literary reformers, from this hasty decision [Thomas Warrow]. Whoever but slightly examines Alabaster's Roxana [published 1632] will find it written in the style and manner of the turgid and unnatural Senece [Joseph Warrow]. See Thomas Warrow's ed. of Milton's Minor Poems.

"Small as is the portion of glory which accrues to Milton from his Latin poetry, there are single sentences of it—aye, single inages—worth all that our island had produced before. In all the volume of Buchanan I doubt whether you can discover a glimpse of poetry; and see sparks fly off the auxil of Max."—W. S. Laxbon.

"Many of the Latin poems of Milton were written in early life, some even at the age of seventeen. It is name, and the just carriedly of mankind to trace the development of a mighty genius, would naturally attract our regard. They are in themselves full all elsastical elegance, of thoughts natural and living, of a diction galled with taste from the gurdens of ancient poetry, of a versification remarkably well cadenced and grateful to the ear. There is in them a marked originality, which Latin verse can rarely admit bett at the price of some incorrectuses or impropriety—a more individual display of the poet's mind than we senally find. 'In the elegies, it is said by Warton, a very competent Judge of Latin poetry, 'Ovid was professedly Milton's model for language and versification. They are not, however, a perpetual and uniform tissue of dyridine, phraseology. With Ovid in view, he has an original manner and character of his own, which exhibit a resultance post pointly of contexture, an arive facility and fluency, for lose his obseptation of Roman models oppress or destroy our proxity poets inheritance, with a frequent recurrence of periods. Ovid is all expression. That Ovid, among the Latin poets, was filton's favorities appears not only from hi be, seems hard to say. The structure of our post's hexaleters is much more Virgilian': nor do I see the least resemblance in them to the manner of Ovid. These Latin poems of Milton hear game traces of juvenility, but, for the most pert, such as pienes us fix that very reason. It is the spring-time of that ardont and brilliant fancy, before the atern and sour spirit of potentical puritainsm had gained outrance into his mind,—the voice of the Allegro and of Comus. . . . England might justly boast, in the earlier part of the century, her Milton: nay, I do not know that, with the exception of a well-known and very pleasing poem, though perhaps hardly of classical simplicity, by Cowley on himself. Epitsphinm Vivi Anctoris, we can produce any thing equally good in this period."—Hallow's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1854, iii. 55–56, 493.

"He was perhaps the only great post of later times who has been distinguished for the excellence of his Latin verse. The genius of Petrarch was scarcely of the first order; and his poems in the sucient language, though most praised by those who have never read them, are wretched compositions. Cowley, with all his admirable wit and ingentity, had little imagination; nor, indeed, do we think his classical diction comparable to that of Milton. The authority of Johnson is against us on this point. But Johnson had studied the bad writers of the Middle Ages till he had become utterly insensible to the Augustan elegance, and was as ill qualified to judge between two Latin at less us a habitual drunkard to set up for a wine-tasker. Versification in a dead lateragage is an exotic,—a far-fetched, costly, sickly imitation of that which elsewhere may be found in healthful and spontaneous perfection. The soils on which this rarily flourishes are in general as ill sujited to the production of rigorous native poetry as the flower-pots of a hot-house to the growth of oaks. That the author of the Paradise Lost should have writen the Epistleto Manso [rdd p. 1207, ante] was traily wonderful. Never b

About him exercised heroic games The unarmed youth of heaven. But o'er their heads Celestial armoury, shield, helm, and spear, Hung high, with diamond flaming and with gold.'

"We cannot look upon the sportive exercises for which the genius of Milton ungirds itself, without catching a glimpso of the gorgeous and terrible panoply which it is accustomed towear. The strength of his imagination triumphed over every obstacle. So intense and ardent was the fire of his mind that it not only was not suffocated beneath the weight of fuel, but penetrated the whole superincumbent mass with its own heat and radiance."—Lord Macaulay: Crit. and Hist. Essays, 1854, i. 9-11.

"Look at Milton's lines on the deaths of the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, and compare them with those on the Marchioness of Winchoster, written about the same time, and the difference between compositions in a living and dead language will be apparent. How fortunate was it that he did not write his Ode on the Nativity in Latin! the same ideas and sentiments might no doubt have been there, but how differently expressed! Beautiful as Milton's Latin poerry must be confessed to be, it probably does not find, even among those familiar with the language, one reader for fifty readers of his English poetry; and few, perhaps, ever read his Latin poems without a secret wish that he had written them in English,"—Keightley's Life, de. of Milton, 300.

We have already referred (see Comus, ante) to the strong oints of resemblance which Mr. Gifford imagines that he discovers between Milton and Ben Jenson:

"It is to be regretted that the prose writings of Milton should, in our time, be so little read. As compositions, they deserve the attention of every man who wishes to become acquainted with the full power of the English language. They shound with passages compared with which the finest declamations of Burke sink into insignificance. They are a perfect field of cloth of gold. The style is stiff with gorgeous embroidery. Not even in the earlier books of the Paradise Lost has the great post ever risen higher than in those parts of his controversial works in which his fuelings, excited by conflict, find a vent in tursts of devotional and lyric rapture. It is, to borrow his own majestic language, a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphomes,"

"We had intended to look more closely at these performances, to analyse the peculiarities of the diction, to dwell at some length on the sultime wisdom of the Arcopagitica and the nervous retention of the Iconoclast, and to point out some of those magnificent passages which occur in the Treatuse of Reformation and the Almadevensions on the Henoustrant. "The distinguishing quality of Milton's prose-writing is vigour, to which are to be added earnestness, dignity, and eloquence, joined with sound logical reasoning from his premises, which however, are not always to be admitted. ... It is not unworthy of notice that, while in English prose he delighted in long and involved sentences, his Latin periods are neither very long nor much involved. This probably arose from his close adherence to his models; for the genius of the Latin language, unlike the Greek, is inclined to brevity and condensation."—Keiphtley's Life, &c. of Milton, 385, 388.

H. PRESOTT: N. Amer. Rec., xiv. 325: Essay: Writing.

"Through all his greater works there prevails an uniform peculiarity of diction, a mode and cast of expression which bears it title resemblance to that of any former writer, and which is so far removed from con mon use that an unlearned reader, when he first opens his book, finds himself surprised by a new language.

"This novelty has been, by those who can find nothing wrong in Milton, imputed to his laborious endeavours after words suitable to the grandour of his ideas. Our language, says Addison, sunkt sucker him. But the truth is that both in prose and verse he had desirous to use knglish words with a foreign idlom. This in all his prose is discovered and condemned, for there Judgment operates fredly, neither softened by the beauty nor awed by the dignity of his shooping: but such is the power of his poetry that his call is obeyed without resistance, the reader feels himself in captivity to a higher and nobler mind, and criticism sinks in admiration."—

On this history the licenser again fixed his claws, and, before he can'll transmit it to the press, tore out several parts. Some centaries of the Saxon monks were taken away, lest they should be applied to the modern elergy, and a character of the Long Parliament and Assaughly of Divines was excluded,—of which the author gave a story to the fact of Angleses, and which, being afterwards published, has been since baserted in its proper place."—Johnson's Life of the history of that meriod absorbed here his autrematic in the proper place."—Johnson's Life of the history of that meriod absorbed in names, but is extremely a transmit and the proper place."—Johnson's Life of the history of that meriod absorbed in names, but is extremely a supplication of the fact of that named absorbed in the proper place."

"The Heptarchy, whatever Hume may say, is very clearly depicted. The style of this work is manly, simple; and it is interspersed with reflections nearly always relating to the time in which the historian wrote. . . It would be impossible to preserve the charm of the original in a translation. The sarrator grades his style as antique as those of the chronicles whence he draws the recital. "From this decision we dissent. We cannot discorn the lauded simplicity: on the contrary, the inversions and Latinisms with which it abounds are far more offensive in mere narrative than when, as in his controversial writings, they are mingled with vigorous learning, lofty declamation, or keen invective."—Keightley's Life, de. of Millon, 377-378.

"Some apology may be thought necessary for making a work so accessible as the present the subject of criticism. The truth is, however, that it is a work which very few read, and which has for the greater part no attractions for the general reader; there are, nevertheless, a few passages of story and sentiment which are calculated to be universally interesting; and it is with the purpose of separating these from the other matter and presenting them to the reader in a collected form that we have adopted it as the subject of an article. . . . Our author's patience, as may be supposed, fails him during the dry and endless rectail of the obscure wars and petty negotiations of the Heptarchy."—Lon. Retrosp. Rev., 1822, vi. 87-100.

LETTER TO MASTER HARTLIB ON EDUCATION.

"This abounds with bursts of his elevated spirit, and sketches out a model of public colleges wherein the teaching should be more comprehensive, more liberal, more accommodated to what he deems the great aim of education than what was is use. "That," he says, 'I call a complete and generous education which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war." But when Milton descends to specify the course of studies he would recommend, it appears singularly ill chosen and impracticable, nearly confined to ancient writers, even in mathematics and other subjects where they could not be sufficient, and likely to leave the student very far from that aptitude for offices of war and peace which he had held forth as the reward of his diligence."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th eds, 1854, ill. 420.

"Milton's plan has more of show than value."—WARTON,
"We have always regarded this treatise of Milton's as a singular instance of how even the greatest of minds will allow themselves to be beguiled by their imagination. . . Surely his experience in teaching might have shown him that what he proposed was little short of impossibility in the present condition of human nature,—a condition not likely ever to be essentially altered. A limit is set to our acquisitions, and he who seeks to be acquainted with teo many things will find himself in the end having little real knowledge of any. Most fortunate, too, for the world, we may add, was it that Milton himself was, as he informs us, educated on a different system, and his splendid imagination allowed to attain its full development. . We cannot conclude without expressing our approval of the regard shown to religion in this system of education."—Keightley's Life, de. of Milton, 259–240, 241.

The following noble sentence from Milton's Tractice of Education should be the first article in every programme of educational exercises, public or private;

Let The end of iterating is to repair the status of th parents by regaining to know God aright." This dictum is worthy of the Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained.

Before we leave this division of our subject, we may be permisted to record the expression of our regret that this most illustrious of schoolmasters never carried out his design (for which he had copious collections) of the compilation of a Latin Dictionary. For educational purposes, iu-deed, it would have been of little use: the researches of the philologists of our own day-of Gosner, Fracciolati, Scheller, Georges, Freund, Kaltschmidt, Rich, Smith, Riddle, Schmitz, Zumpt, Anthon, Andrews, Leverett, Rebbins, Turner, Felton, Woolsey, and many others in Germany, England, and America—have filled our schoollibraries with more classical erudition than the pupils of this or the next generation will be competent to master. But who would not have been pleased to see in a state of rest and arranged in appropriate columns that formidable army of well-disciplined troops with which the veteran leader of the English Republic attacked with such vigour and—his champions say—with such success the redoubt-able charge of the hitherto unconquerable Salmasius? Again: it is almost superfluous to remark that Milton's Latin Dictionary would have been an invaluable key to the sources of many of the felicitous classical appropriations and adaptations which abound in his works. But we linger too long over vain imaginations of what might have been done, whilst our narrative remains incomplete of what was actually effected.

DE DOCTRINA CHRISTIANA, LIBRI DUO POSTHUMI.

The history of this work is well known: it was found by Mr. Lemon, Deputy-Keeper of the State Papers, in a press of his office, in 1823 : see No. 64, (ante.) There was some disposition, on the first publication of the work, (in 1825,) to question its pretensions to its professed authorship; but there never was any intelligent doubt on the subject.

"The authenticity of this work appears indisputable: were the history of the manuscript less satisfactory, the internal evidence would be conclusive. The mind of Milton is stamped on every page. Not only are the known opinions of this remarkable maintained with the usual soriousness of his character, but the manner in which he arrived at certain newer tenets, adopted at a manner in which he arrived at certain newer tenets, adopted at a later period of life, bears the same unquestionable impress of his peculiar way of thinking. . . . We cannot anticipate the extensive or lasting popularity of this treatise. The prose works of Milton are little read, notwithstanding their occasional sublimity both of thought and diction. In the present work, when the curiosity which its discovery has excited shall subside, there is little to attract, little to keep alive a greater degree of interest than in any other divinity of that age, . . In the plentitude and abundance of his fame as the author of Paradiae Lost, Milton must be content to average his claims more mildicattention as the writer of

In the plentiude and abundance of his fame as the author of Paradias Lost, Milton must be content to merge his claims upon public attention as the writer of a summary of theology."—Lon. Quar. Rev., xxvii. 442–457.

"The character of Milton, long as it has been before the world, has, until lately, been but partially understood. It is not to be gathered from his poetry alone; and his prose (vigorous as some of it is) has been but little studied; nor, indeed, are his views on many points so fully developed in any of his former works as in this most curious Treatise of Christian Doctrine. In him we now posses, filled up with all the accuracy of detail, a magnificent specimen of the Puritan in his least offensive form: the forvour, the davotion, the honest indignation, the moral fearlessness, the uncompromising impetuosity, the fantastic imagination, of the party, all conspicuous,—unalloyed, however, by the hypocriety, the vulgarity, the cant, the cananing and bad tasts which have so generally made the name to stink in the nostrils of men. ... We have truly marked. All the world knew that he was an eloquent, a high-nainded, 'an anstero man,' mighty in the Scriptures; but how visionary he was (though Warburton threw out hints that could not have been altogether neglected by able inquirers) none of hie biographers have ever told us: not indeed, perhaps, until the Treatise on Christian Doctrine was brought to light could they tell us at full; yet here, and here alone, will be found the solution of many anomalies in his history and of many peculiarities in his posms."—Rosert Scottists Doctrine was brought to light could they tell us at full; yet here, and here alone, will be found the solution of many anomalies in his history and of many peculiarities in his posms."—Rosert Scottists Doctrine was brought to light could they tell us at full; yet here, and here alone, will be found the solution of many anomalies in his

We may apply to him what Denham with great falletty says of Cowley:—he wears the garb, but not the clothes, his movement in the carolesaness of a many property of a foreigner. not always so happy in his inferences as in his citations.

"Some of the heteroidox doctrines which he avows seem to have socied considerable amazement,—particularly his Arianism and his theory on the subject of judygamy. Yet we can scarcely conceive that any person could have read the Paradiae Lost without suspecting him of the former; nor do we think that any reader acquainted with the history of his life ought to be much startled at the latter. The opinions which he has expressed respecting the nature of the Delty, the eternity of matter, and the observation of the Sabhath, might, we think, have caused more just surprise.

"But we will not go into the discussion of these joints. The book, were it far more orthodox or far more heretical than it is, would not much edify or corrupt the present generation. The men of our time are not to be converted or per certed by quartos. A few more days, and this essay will follow the Defensio Populi to the dust and silence of the upper shelf. The name of its narti or and the remarkable circumstances attending its publication will secure to it a certain degree of attention. 3. MILTON'S GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS AS AN AUTHOR. Few men have ever so thoroughly prepared themselves for comprehensive and successful authorship as did the illustrious subject of our notice:

"Milton.—the most perfect scholar, as well as the sublimest post, that our country has ever produced."—Sir William Jores: Letter to Lody Spincer, Sept. 7th, 1709, describing his wisit to Milton's house at Forest Hill.

nouse of Forest Itili.
"He received a learned education: he was a profound and elegant classical scholar: he had studied all the mysteries of Rabbinical literature: he was intinately acquainted with every language of modern Europe from which either pleasure or information was then to be derived."—LORD MACAULAY: Crit. and Histor. Every, 1654, 1. 9.

His lordship, indeed, endeavours to prove that the development of the poetle talent is in an inverse ratio to mental culture and thorough scholarship, and therefore that, in becoming a great poet in spite of his extensive erndition, Milton was obliged to overcome difficulties as great as his learning was comprehensive and profound. We shall not pause to ask whether this be intended as a serious proposition or as an ingenious paradox. Extract the scholarship from Paradise Lost, Comus. Lycidas, or Samson Agonistes, and much of the lofty superstructure will surely "topple to its fall." We continue our quotawill surely "topple to its fall." tions from this eminent critic:

"The most striking characteristic of the poetry of Milton is the extreme remoteness of the associations by means of which it acts "The most attiking charactoristic of the poetry of Milton is the extreme remoteness of the associations by means of which it acts on the reader. Its effect is produced not so much by the ideas which it directly conveys as by other ideas which have connected with them. He electrifies the mind through conductors. The most unimaginative man innet understand the Iliad. Homor gives him no choice and requires from him no exertion, but takes the whole upon himself, and sets the images in so clear a light that it is impossible to be blind to them. The works of Milton cannot be comprehended or enjoyed unless the mind of the reader co-operate with that of the writer. He does not paint a finished picture or play for a mere passive listener. He sketches, and leaves others to fill up the outline. He strikes the key-note, and expects his hearer to make out the melody. . . It would, indeed, be scarcely safe to draw any decided inferences as to the character of a writer from passages directly egotiatical. But the qualities which we have ascribed to Milton, though perhaps most strungly marked in those parts of his works which treat of his personal feelings, are distinguishable in every page, and impart to all his writings, prose and potery. English, Latin, and Italian, a strong family-likeness."—

That Milton was as great a scholar as a poet we see by tis.

"That Milton was as great a scholar as a poet we see by I's writing in Latin as fluently as in English: he composed Greek verses; witness some of his minor pieces. It was from the original text of the Prophest that he derived their fire. The lyre of Tasso was not unknown to him. He spoke nearly all the living languages of Europe. Anothe Francini, a Florentine, expresses likeself with regard to Milton as if the poet of Abbon, while journeying through Italy, had been in the full enjoyment of his fame:—'Another Babel would for him confuse tongues to vain; for Englished the besides thy most noble idiom, he is master of Spanish, Franciand Desides thy most noble idiom, he is master of Spanish, Franciand Treek, and Latin.'"—Chatcaubriand's Sketches of Eng. Lat., 182.

"Milton was perhaps the first writer [in England] who smimently possessed a genuine discernment and feeling of antiquity;
though it may be perceived in Spenser and also a very few who, wrote press?—Hallam's Liu. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed., 1804, [ii. 32, "Of all the borrowers from Homer, Milton is perhaps the least indebted. He was naturally a thinker for himself, confidently of his own abilities, and disdainful of help or hindrapse; he dide not he did not seek them. From his confemporaries he maither our mor received support; there is in his writings spaining by which the p. ide of other authors might be gratified; or favour gained,—no exchange of praise, nor solicitation of support. His great works were performed under discountienance and in bludness; but difficulties anaised at his touch; he was born for whatever is arduse; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems only because it is not the first."—Ohnson's Life of Millon.

"It is certain that this author, when in a happy mood and employed on a noble subject, is the most wonderfully sublime of any paguage, Homer and Lucrotius and Tasso not excepted. More concise than Homer, more simple than Tasso, more nervous than Lucretius, had he lived in a later age and learned to polish some rudeness in his verses, had he enjoyed better fortune and possessed loisure to watch the returns of genius on himself, he had attained the pinnacle of perfection and borne away the palm of epic poetry."—Hume's History of England, Bowyer's ed., 180d, iv. 68d.

"Call him henceforward the most glorious one that ever existed upon earth. If two—Bacon and Shakspeare—have equalled him in diversity and intensity of power, did either of these spring away with such resolution from the sublimest heights of genius to hiberate and illuminate with patient labour the manacled human acc? And what is his recompense. The same recompense as all men like him have received, and will receive for ages. Persecution 500ws righteomaness: the Scorpion is next in succession to Libra. The fool, however, who ventures to detract from Milloris genius in the night which now appears to close on him, will, when the dawn has opened on his dull ferecity, be ready to bite off a limb if he might thereby limp away from the trap he has prowled into. Among the geniler, the better, and the wiser, few have entered yet the awful structure of his mind; few completed, few are willing to contemplate, its vastness. Politics now occupy scarcely a close tin it. We seldom are inclined to converse on them; and, when we do, it is jossely rather than austerely. For over the bitterest borries g direction of the whois: to Milton a smaller part, but with plenary power over it; and she bestowed on him such ferrour and majesty of eloquence as on no other mortal in any age. . . . If ever there was a poet who knew Nature well and described her in all her loveliness, it was Milton . . . Milton has equal strength [with Demosthoues] without an abatement of beauty,—not a sinew sharp or rigid, not a vein variose or inflated. Hercules killed robbers and ravishers with his knotted club; he cleansed also royal stables by turning whole rivers into them: Apollo, with no labour or effort, overcame the Python, brought around him, in the full accordance of harmony, all the Muses, and illuminated with his sole splendour the nulversal world. Such is the difference I see between Bemosthenes and Milton. . . . I find traces in Milton of mearly all the bost Latin poets. This is singular; for there is in both of them a generous warmth and a contemptuous severity. . . . Warton and Johnson are of opinion that Milton is defective in the sonse of harmony. But Warton had lost his enry by laying it down on low and swampy places, on ballads and sonnets; and Johnson was a deaf adder coiled up in the brambles of party prejudices. He was acute and judicious, he was honest and generous, he was forbearing and humane; but he was cold when he was overshadowed."—W. S. LANDOR.

"It will not be too much to say that, of all uninspired writings, (if these be uninspired.) Milton's are the most worthy of profound study by all minds which would know the creativeness, the splendour, the learning, the eloquence, the wisdom, which the human intellect can reach. Among the miraculous acquirements of Milton was his deep and familiar intimacy with all classical and all chivalrous literature,—the amalgamation in his mind of all the philosophy and all the subtime and ornamented literature of the ancients, and all the subtime and ornamented literature of the ancients, and all the subtime and ornamented literature of the ancients, and all the subtime of the mantle of Time from the ancient ressures of genius and mingled with them their own grade conceptions and fantastic theories. "The very splendour of his poette fame has tended to obscure or conceal the extent of his mind and the variety of its energies and attainments. To many he seems only a poet, when in truth he was a profound scholar, a man of vast compass of thought, imbued thoroughly with all ancient and modern learning, and able to master, to mould, to impregnate with his qwn intellectual power, his great and various acquisitions. . . In delineating fair for its distinguishing attributes. His name is almost identified with sublimity. He is in truth the sublimost of men. He rises, not by effort or discipline, but by a native tendency and a god'ke ustinct, to the contemplation of objects of grandeur and avalances. He always moves with a conscious energy. There is no subject so vast or terrific as to repel or intimidate him. The overpowering grandeur of a theme kindles and attracts him. . . This attribute of power is universally felt to characterize Milton. His sublimity is in every man's mouth. Is it felt that his poetry breathes a sensibility and tenderness hardly surpassed by its sublimity? . . We might quote pages in illustration of the qualities here ascribed to Milton. . . In illustration of Milton's tenderness, we will open almost at a venture. . . We close our remarks on Milton's poetry with observing that it is characterized by seriousness . . . But Milton's poetry, though habitually serious, is always healthful, and bright, and vigorous. It has no gloom. He took no pleasure in drawing dark pictures of life; for he knew, by experience, that there is a power in the soul to transmute calamity into an oxeasion and nutriment of moral power and triumphant virtue."—William E. Channing, D.D.: Essay on the Poetical Gentus of Milton. "Milton possessed an imagination of the highest order,—an

"Milton possessed an imagination of the highest order," "Milton possessed an imagination of the highest order,—an imagination which could combine or create at will the noblest objects of contemplation. His early poems sufficiently attest the energy of this divine power in his mind. The classical style of his verses never affects its originality, and they run like a stream of life and beauty wherever the imagination is free to operate. All the other fuculties of his intellect received their tone from this... His deficiency of passion was the only element which was wanting to the perfection of his poetic character. When we examine it in respect to every other, we find it full and complete,—perfect not only in the higher and rarer requisites of genius, but in those lighter qualities from which inferior minds derive their sole claim to consideration."—Rev. Hanny Strebeing: Memoirs of Milton.

sole claim to consideration."—KEV. HENRY ETKERING: MEMORY of Millon.

"It is owing in part to his blindness, but more perhaps to his general residence in a city, that Millon, in the words of Coleridge, is not a picturesque but a market poor, or, as I would prefer to say, is the latter more of the two. He describes visible things, and often with great powers of rendering them manifest, what the Greeks called \(\text{thepseta}\), though seldom with so much circumstantial exactness of character as Spenser or Dante, but he feels music. The sense of vision delighted his imagination; but that of sound wrapped his whole soul in ecstasy."—Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th ed. 1654, iii. 479.

"It has been, indeed, objected to Milton. by a common perversion of criticism, that his ideas were musical rather than picturesque, as if because they were in the highest degree musical they must be (to keep the sage critical balance even, and to allow no one man to possess two qualities at the same time) proportionably deficient in other respects. But Milton's poetry is not cast in any such narrow, commonplace mould; it is not so barren of resources. His worship of the muse was not so simple or confined. A sound arises

we hear the pealing organ; but the incense on the altar is also there, and the statues of the gods are ranged around. The ear, indeed, predominates over the eye, because it is more immediately affected, and because the language of music blends more immediately with and forms a more natural accompaniment to the variable and indefinite associations of ideas conveyed by words. But where the associations of the imagination are the principal thing the individual object is given by Milton with equal force and beauty... Milton's works are a perpetual invocation to the muses,—a hymn to fame... Milton has borrowed more than any other writer, and exhausted every source of imitation, sacred and prowing yet he is purfectly distinct from every other writer. He is a writer of centos, and yet in originality searce inferior to flomer. The power of his mind is stamped on every line. The fervour of his imagination melts down and renders malleable, as in a furnase, the most contradictory materials. In reading his works we feel-ourselves under the influence of a mighty intellect, that the meaner it approaches to others becomes more distinct from them. The quantity of art in him shows the strength of his guiss; the weight of his intellectual obligations would have oppressed any other writer. Milton's learning has all the effect of intuition. He describes objects, of which he could only have read in books, with all the vividness of actual observation. His imagination has the force of nature. He makes words tell as pictures. "Intellect. "We profess that superstitions veneration for the memory of the great eat of poets which would regard the slightest relic of him as its land we cannot conceive either true poetical sensibility or a just sense of the glory of England to belong to that Englishman who would not feel the strongest emotions at the sight of a deheimble and unlettered of human beings."—Six James Mackintonic Miscoll, Works, 1854, il. 199.

"Of Milton's mind the leading characteristic is its unity. He has the thoughts of all ages at his command; but he has made them his own. He sits 'high on a throne of royal state, adorned with all the wealth of Ormus and of Ind. and where the gorgeous East with richest hand has showered barbaric pearl and gold. There are no false gems in him, no tinsel. It seems as if nothing could dwell in his mind but what was grand and sterling."—Guesses at Truth; by the brothers Hare.

Thou hadst a voice whose sound was lite the sea
Pure as the naked heavens majestic, free:
So didst thou travel on life's common way In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart The lowliest duties on herself did lay."

4. MILTON THE MAN AND THE POLITICIAN.

We have often had occasion to remark-and, we trust, have not failed to confirm precept by practice—that a writer of biographies, representing all classes of thought and shades of spinion, should be a cosmopolitan in the most liberal sense of that truly liberal term. Not unmindful of the responsibility which enforces a conscientious selection of, responsionly which emissions considerates selection of, and a firm adherence to, his moral, political, and religious tenets, he should ever remember that a perpetual trace is penelaimed in that common depository of the thoughts of the illustrious dead out of those who still live to labour he, thoir race,—the Soul of the House, as Clears beautifully styles the Library. Thus believing and thus acting, we scruple not continually to record on our pages opinious the most directly opposed to each other, and, of course, as frequently directly opposed to our own. The ingenious abudant against the requisition of houseldess and institute that the requisition of houseldess and institute the requisition of houseldess and institute that the requisition of houseldess and institute the requisition of houseldess and institute that the requisition of houseldess are the requirements. student, eager for the acquisition of knowledge, and just beginning to "lift up his voice after wisdom and seeking after her as for hid treasure," will often be confounded to find the same eminent character chronicled on our pages perchance on the same page—as a traitor and a patriot, a sage and a charlatan, an infide and a saint. Party champions may blame us for such unusual candour; but we confess "we are not careful to answer in this matter;" the contess we are not careful to answer in this matter: sue advocate of no class, our only anxiety shall be to do justice to all. This judicial impartiality—"wherein (let no man hear us) we take pride"—we certainly did not learn from the sanguinary bard who glorifies in the Muss. Anglicans the Oxford Decree of 1883, which anathematises and condomns to the flames all the books then published in defence of the rights of mankind, and, among others, the works of John Milton. The exulting poet to whom we have referred, not sufficiently grateful for this philanthropic boon, permits his imagination to revel in the prospective spectacle of the unhappy writers keeping company with their favourite productions, and especially dwells upon the pleasing sight of

"In medio videas flamma crepitante cremari Miltonum—terris colloque framabile nomen!"

Such was the meed of encouragement which the author of the Defensio received from some of the scholars of his generation. This amiable person, however, is pleased afterwards to assure us that the fame of Milton would have perished only with the world if he had had discernment enough to sing the praises of Carolus Sconndus. That Milton would have preferred to gratify the poet with the cremation which the latter had rehearsed with such gusto, who can doubt?

Hume was of too benevolent a constitution to burn any body, although indeed a martyrdom by sarcasm (repsa(se) would be but little preferable. He thus notices the patriotic labours of the Defensio:

amours of the Deiensio;
"It is, however, remarkable that the greatest genius by far that shone out in England during this period was deeply engaged with these fanatics, [the Parliamentary party.] and over prestituted his pen in theological controversy, in factious disputes, and in justifying the most violent measures of the party. This was John Milton, whose poems are admirable, though liable to some objections; his pross writings disagreeable, [Joubiless to the historian,] though not altogether defective in genius."—Hume's Hist, of England, Bowyer's et., 1806, iv. 666.

Even the greate Addison in one of the artists.

Even the gentle Addison, in one of the carliest fruits of his muse, rebukes the popular champion in no measured terms:

"Oh, had the poet ne'er profaned his pen
To varnish o'er the guilt of faithless men,
His other works might have deserved applause;
But now the language can't support the cause;
While the clear current, though serene and bright, Detrays a bottom collous to the sight."—An Account of the Greatest English Poets to Henry Sucherers, April 3, 1694; Addison's Works, H. G. Bohn's ed., 1854, L. 25.

Even Milton's attached friend, Andrew Marvell, did not defend all of his controversial writings:

"John Milton" he says to Bishop Parker, "was and is a man of as great learning and sharpness of wit as any man. I was his misfortune, living in a turnituous time, to be rossed on the wrong side; and he wrote, flagrance brille, certain dangerous treatises," &c.

It is to be admitted that when the enthusiastic champion of liberty, clad with zeal as a cloak, sent forth to meet his enemies, he did not linger to select the smoothest stones of the brook :

"The most violent philippies," remarks Professor Smyth, "that over appeared against this party [the Presbyterian] may be found in the prose works of Milton. The invectives of this great post against prelates and Presbyterians will perfectly astonish those who as yet are conversant only with his immortal work, his descriptions of the Garden of Ridon and the piety and innocence of our first parents."—Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

A late post-laureate, who at one period of his life would have recorded a far different judgment, about the date of his fifty-third birthday thus discourses of Milton:

would have recorded a lar ginerens, and the date of his fifty-third birthday thus discourses of Milton:

"The politics of Milton had been consigned to oblivion by common consent, until recent circumstances (the publication of the treatise De Doctriaa Christiana, in 1820) socidentally revived them; and now to oblivion they had better return: they are hig uncomely parts.'... The most judicious of his admirers will admit that in his political writings the author of Paradise Loss basefallen; and their aim will be, not to expose that fall by making it admirers will be not to expose that fall by making it admirers will be not to contribute towards its deceney, and be hide it with their mantle... Nor do we speak this is missiant unadvisedly; it is his own acknowledgment that, in writing one matters of politic he knew himself inferior to initiatelf, and that the politic he have himself inferior to initiatelf, and that the politic he had be not another sail, he lead in the

with the use of his left hand.'... Whilst we bow, therefore, to fillton as the poet, in Milton as a divine or a statesman we can only see a visionary, and cannot but think that to assert his merits is these latter departments to come forward (if we may use the words of a great master of eloquence) with hymne and cymbale to adore the mighty luminary when he is suffering an eclipse."—ROSERT SOURES: Lon. Quar. Resp., xxxvi. 29, 40, 61.

We have already quoted different opinions on a preceding page, and can readily add to the list:

"Milton is our patriot. No man of just discernment can read his political writings without being penetrated with the holy flame that animated him. ... As an original genius, as a writer of forty and expansive soul, and as a man, he rises above his countrymen; and, like Saul in the convention of the Jews, from his shoulders and upward he is higher than any of the people."—Goden.

"It may be doubted whether the Creator ever created one altogether so great as Milton,—taking into one view at once (as much indeed as can at once be taken into it his manly virtues, his superhuman genius, his zeal for truth, for true plety, freedom, his elequence in displaying it, his contempt of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contenty of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contenty of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contenty of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contenty of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contenty of personal power, his glory and exultation in his contents on the same suffered wounds and dissolution in his contents on the same suffered wounds and dissolution in his content of cond have suffered wounds and dissolution in his content of his activity and the bones of this our mighty defender, once shining in celestial panoply, once glowing at the trumper-blast of God. but not prove a gainst the desperate and the dannet, than I have felt at entering the humble abode of Milton, whose spirit already seaches heaven, yet whose c

The reader probably remembers the graphic account which Sir William Jones gives to Lady Spencer of his visit (September 7, 1769) to Milton's house at Forest Hill: a paragraph in one of Madame du Bocage's Letters concerning England, informs us that on a visit, in June 1750 to Barm Schutz and hale at their house. June, 1750, to Baron Schutz and lady at their house near

Shotovor Hill,

They shewed me from a small eminence Millon's house, [the same just referred to,] to which I bowed with all the reverence which that poot's memory inspires me."

See also Miss Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life (1852, i. 45) for an interesting description of Milton's cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, four miles from Beaconsfield, Buckinghamsbire. This is the retreat, it will be remembered, procured for the poet by Ellwood during the Great Plague of London. Mr. Rowitt's history of Milton's residences will of course be eagerly perused. No one could doubt that this gentleman would write enthusiastically of the great champion of Reform; and in such a cause Quaker tranquillity rises to impassioned eloquence:

astically of the great champion of Reform; and in such a cause Quaker tranquillity rises to impassioned eloquence: . "Thus the Prince of Poets, as Hazlit styled him," concludes Mr. Howitt. "sleeps in good company. The times in which he lived, and the part he took in them, were certain to load his name with obloquy and misrepresentation; but the solemn dignity of his life, and the lofty tone and principle of his writings, more and more suffice not only to vindicate him, but to commend him to posterity. No man ever loved liberty and virtue with a purraffection; no man ever laboured in their cause with a more distinguished seal; no man ever brought to the task a more glorious genius, accomplished with a more consummate learning. Milton was the noblest model of a devoted patriot and true Englishman; and the study of his works is the most certain means of perpetuating to his country spirits worthy of her greatness."—Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Ibets, vol. i.
"Revolutions have approximated him to us," says Chateubriand: "his political ideas make him a man of our own epoch. He complains in his verses that he came a century too late; he might have complained in his prose that he had come a contury too early. The hour of his resurrection is now arrived. . Milton shook with a mighty hand all the lifeas agitated in our own age. These ideas slept for one hundred and fifty ypars, and did not awake until 1798. Night it not be supposed that the political works of the post were written in our times, on subjects which we see discussed every morning in the public papers? . . We discorn in Milton a man of troubled spirit; still under the influence of revydictionary scenes and passions, he should error after the downfall of that revolution which had fled to him for shelter and palpitated in his bosom. But the carnestness of that revolution overspowers him; religious gravity forms the counterpoles to his political agitations. Stuaned, however, at the overthrow of his bodost. Blusions, at the dissipation of his drea singular fortitude of mind, arising from a consolou abilities and a conviction that his cause was just."

We shall next quote the eloquent commendation of a countryman of our own, who refers touchingly to a de-privation the evils of which none than himself better knows how to estimate, and yet which his indomitable knows how to estimate, and yet which his indomitable industry has so effectually overcome that the world has never felt itself to be a partner in the loss. There has been "day-labour, light denied," and the many "talents" have been "occupied" to a golden return.

"Indignant at every effort to crush the spirit, and to cheat it, in his own words, "of that liberty which rarefes and enlightens it like the influence of heaven," he proclaimed the rights of man as a rational immortal being, undismayed by menace and obloquy, amid a generation of servile and unprincipled sycophants. The blindness which excluded him from the things of earth opened to him more glorious and spiritualized conceptions of heaven, and alded him in exhibiting the full influence of those sublime truths which the privilege of free inquiry in religious matters had poured upon the mind."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT: Miscellanies, 1855, 273, "We have now completed the history of John Milton." remarks Dr. Symmona.—"a nan in whom have illustriously combined all the qualities that could adorn or could elevate the nature to which

Dr. Symmons.—"a man in whom have illustriously combined all the qualities that could adorn or could elevate the nature to which he belonged,—a man who at once possessed beauty of countenance, symmetry of form, elegance of manners, benevolence of temper, magnanimity and lottiness of soul, the brightest illumination of intellect, knowledge the most various and extended, virtue that never loitered in her career nor deviated from her course,—a man who, if he had been delegated as the representative of his species to one of the superior worlds, would have suggested a grand idea of the human race, as of beings affinent in moral and intellectual treasure, raised and distinguished in the universe as the favourites and heirs of Heaven."—Prefixed to Millon's Prose Works.

We have purposely reserved for the conclusion of this department of our subject the culogium of an eminent living critic, who perhaps has done more to revive the popular interest in the works of his illustrious theme than iving critic, who perhaps has done more to revive the popular interest in the works of his illustrious theme than any writer of the age:

"If ever despondency and asperity could be excused in any man, they might have been excused in Milton. But the strength of his mind overcame every calamity. Neither blindness nor gout, nor age, nor penury, nor domestic afflictions, nor political disappointments, nor abuse, nor proscription, nor neglect, had power to disturb his sedate and majestic pathence. His spilits do not seem to have been high, but they were singularly equable. His temper was serious, perhaps stern; but it was a temper which no sufferings could render sullen or fretfal. Such as it was when, on the eave of great events, he returned from his travels, in the prime of health and manly beauty, loaded with literary distinctions and glowing with patriotic hopes, such it continued to be when, after having experienced every calamity whigh is incident to our nature, old, poor, signities, and disgraced, he being the house our mature, old, poor, signities, and disgraced, he being the house to our mature, old, poor, signities, and disgraced, he being the have been tried in the furnace and have proved pure, which have been tried in the furnace and have not been found withing, which have been delared sterling by the general consent of mankind, and which are visibly stamped with the image and superscription of the Most High. These great men we trust that we know how to prize; and of these was Milton. The sight of his books, the sound of his name, are pleasant to us. His thoughts resemble those celestial fruits and flowers which the Virgin Mary of Massinger sent down from the productions of other soils, not only by superior bloom and sweetness, but by miraculous efficacy to invigorate and to heal. They are powerful not only to delight, but to clevate and purify. Nor do we cury the man who can study either the life or the writings of this great poet and patriot without aspiring to emulate, not indeed the subline works wit

Robert Southey said in 1827, and we say in 1857, and expect to say for another lustre at least, "A life of Milton is yet a desideratum in our literature."

We have already referred with just commendation to Mr. Keightley's creditable contribution recently given to the world,—An Account of the Life, Opinions, and Writings of John Milton, 1855, 8vo, pp. 484; but no one, we imagine, would be better pleased to see his volume supplanted by a comprehensive, elaborate, and exhaustive blography of the great bard than Mr. Keightley himself. But the biographer of Milton must be no ordinary mas. He should be intimately acquainted with the history of He should be intimately acquainted with the history of the Commonwealth and the Restoration, yet no partisan; deeply versed in the literature of ancient Greece and Rome, Rev., xvi. 155, (Works of Milton;) Eclec. "But who is sufficient for these things?" Yet we shall but fail to look for such a biographer with some measure of a cheering hope; and when he appears we shall bow to him with only less reverence than we feel for the illus-trious subject who elicits the best exertions of his mind and the warmest affections of his heart.

Since the above was prepared for the press, there has been announced a New Life of Milton, by Mr. David Mas-son, Professor of English Literature in University College, London, whose contributions to Miltonic literature we have already had occasion to notice. Vol. i. will comprehend the period from 1608 to 1639. We trust that Mr. Masson's success will be commensurate to his enterprise.

As for ourselves, whilst engaged in the erection of this humble temple to the genius, the virtue, the patriotism, and the piety of Milton, we have felt that we were occupying little less than hallowed ground; and, whilst arranging with auxious care the freewill offerings which the devotion of two centuries has cast into the treasury of letters, we have endeavoured to profit by the self-forgetful example of the builders of a greater edifice, where no sound of hammer or axe was heard, whilst in reverent silence the sealous labourers willingly gave themselves to their grateful toil.

His name is also familiar to the profession of his labours. His name is also familiar to the profession as associate reporter of the decisions of Judge Woodbury, in the First Circuit Court; and his edition of the nine volumes of English Admiralty Reports, republished by Initile & Brown in 1853, bears evidence of his industry and learning in this branch of his profession. "It has been remarked that the study of Irving's sketches has left traces of imitation too evident in the writings of Mitchell. His style has in many passages a certain charm of dreamy quietude and pleasurable pensiveness; but when we have read a few piges we have a desire to vary the time, or, indeed, to change the key-note. The author of Dream Life might be compared with a musician who knows little of the resources of modulation and attempts to write a symphony on a few simple chords in one scale. It seems strange to find in American books by young authors a want of the freshness and variety of life. Pathos has its place in fiction, but should leave room for other moods of mind."—Hand-Buck of Amer. Lit., Hist., High., and Crit., 1356, 188.

"Mr. Mitchell does not bear reading from cover to cover. The want of sustained interest in his books, and the very fragmentary manner in which he arranges then, are indeed unfavourable to a continued perusal. . . There is a sameness about their very perfections that wearies us as we go on. They are the changalgn lands of sentiment,—beautiful levels, over which an hour's gallop or a day's meditation is charming. But to stay there for any length of time induces terrible lassitude and mental depression. This arises from the aimost femining delicacy of Mr. Mitchell's mature."—Putanaw's Mag., Jan., 1853, 14-78; Our Young Authors.

It is understood that whilst Mr. Mitchell was United States Consul at Venice, in 1853, he collected materials for a projected history of Venice. The undertaking is an ambitious one, and may well "give him pause;" trust that he will not be dismayed by the difficulties of the task,-which no historical student, indeed, is likely to underrate.

"Aristophanes is much obliged to Mr. Mitchell. "Aristophanes is much obliged to Mr. Mitchell. Until this accomplished gentleman took up the cause of the old Greck Comedy, we believe that a majority even of literary persons amongst us were content to think of it according to the fashion of these egregious judges of antiquity, the French. . . For much of the wholesome change of sentiment here noticed, Aristophanes, we say again, must thank the rare ability and elegant scholarship lavihed on his works by one who, it is pleasant to add, seems as fresh and zealous as ever in the service."—Edin. Mr. Mitchell has been blamed for a want of relevancy in some of his notes in the works edited by him, and especially f r the obtrusive display of his aristocratic predilections in contradistinction to the democratical character of a portion of his text. His Preliminary Discourse (pp. 160) to the Comedies of Aristophanes has elicited warm commendations by its eloquence of style and critical acumen. Dr. Mitchill filled a number of important public posts in addition to those here number of important puote posts in addition to those pore enumerated, and was a zealous promoter of the prosperity of his adopted State. touch the sacred fabrick of his master." We now continue the quotation from the point where we left off:
"The treatise of Lord Redesdale on Pleadings in Chancery is of the same masterly and original character. It has traced out the nature and extent of the jurisdiction and practice of courts of chancery with so much brevity, perspicuity, and analytical exectness, that probably to this more than any other work we owe some of the most valuable improvements in the principles as well as the proceedings which regulate the administration of equity."-N. Nearly twenty years after the above was written (i.e. in 1836) Judge Story pub. the first two vols. of his commen-taries on Equity Jurisprudence. Into this great work he transferred the most of Mitford's treatise, and generally in the language of the author, which, he remarks,

"I have not the presumption to think I could improve, and from which I have rarely deviated, except to insist upon some qualification or to make his text occasionally more definite and clear."

On page 22 of vol. i., 6th ed., 1853, he styles Lord Redesdale "one of the ablest judges that ever sat in Equity; and he considers his lordship's "general account" of a court of equity " far more satisfactory as a definite enumeration than the outline of Mr. Justice Blackstone," (pp. 30-31.)

"That great lawyer," remarks Mr. Sheil of Lord Redesdale, "in-troduced a reformation in Irish practice. He substituted great learning, unwearded dillgence, and a spirit of scientific discussion for the flippant apothegms and irritable self-sufficiency of the late Lord Clare. He entertained an honourable passion for the study as well as for the profits of his profession; and, not satisfied with pronouncing judgments which adjusted the rights of the immediate parties, he disclosed the foundations of his decisions, and, opening the deep ground-work of equity, revealed the principles upon which the whole edifice is established."—Sketches of the Irish Bar, Dr. R. Mitford. Mary Russell. 1786–1855. a native of Mitford, Mary Russell, 1786-1855, a native of Alresford, Hampshire, was the daughter of a physician, who possessed a remarkable facility in dissipating large amounts of money, and ran through several fortunes, in addition to one of £20,000—the produce of a lottery-ticket which he presented to Mary on her tenth birthday. His daughter, however, was devotedly attached to this modern Murad the Unlucky,—for such he was, notwithstanding the good fortune just mentioned,—and cheerfully and assiduously plied her pen to repair the breaches made by paternal improvidence.

"When Mary Russell Mitford, whose heart was in her fragedies, sat up late into many a summer morning to finish and polish those more marketable prose sketches which she was compelled by the extravagance of others to produce, (such being the real facts of the origin of 'Our Village,') she little dreamed that by labour so compulsory and so little prized she was laying the first stone of a littrary of literature, and setting a pattern which some some of a littrary of literature, and setting a pattern which some some of men, women, and children in England and America would fill a page in the 'Accidents of Authorship.'"—Lon. Athensons, 1807, 1447:
Our Old Town, by Thomas Miller.

Miss Mitford's own words are as follows:

"The pressing necessity of carningmoney, and the uncertainties

"The pressing necessity of earningmoney, and the uncertainties and delays of the drama as moments when disappointment or delay weighed upon me like a sin, made it a duty to turn away from the lofty steep of Tragic Poetry to the every day path of Yillage

1. Miscellaneous Verses, 1806.

2. Christina, the Maid of the South Seas, 1806; 1811, 8vo. This poetic nerrative, in the style of Scott, is founded upon the story of the Mutiny of the Bounty. 3. Blanche, 1806. This is a Spanish story, and of the same character as the work just named. 4. Poems, 1810, fp. 8vo, pp. 144. This collection contains Sybilié, a Northumbrian Tale, and a number of minor poems. A second ed., with addits., was pub. 1811, 8vo.

"In our cursory examination of this little volume we have noticed everal unportical and augraceful, and not a few ungramatical, lines. It must be apparent, we think, to every oue that Miss Mitfard's taste and judgment are not yet matured; that her paems ought to have been kept back much longer and revised makeh oftener before they were submitted to the public; and, above all, that she wanted some friend who, without wounding her feelings or damping the fire of her genius, would have led her Q corrector models of taste and taught her more cautious habits of composition. That such instruction would not have been thrown away we judge from many pleasing passages scartered through her little volume, which do no discredit to the amiableness of her mind and the cultivation of her talents. When she attempts to describe the higher passions, as in Sybille, she fulls from want of strength for the flight. But in the description of natural scenery or the defineation of humbler and calmer feelings she is more successful. The following lines form part of a poem written in a favourite arbour, and are a pleasing initation of the style and subject of Grongar Hill: "In our cursory examination of this little volume we have no Grongar Hill:

"How fair this living picture gleams!"-p. 45.]

" Passages of equal or superior merit might be collected from the volume amply sufficient to show that, with better advice and more mature deliberation, Miss Mitford's mase would not sing unheard nacture deriversion, datas armord a muse would not sing unneary or unattended; but we can have little hope of this if she does not forever forsake the thorny and barren field of politics, so unfavour-able to the laurel of Parnassus."—William Gifford: Lon. Quar. able to the laurel of Parnas Rev., iv. 514-519, Nov. 1810.

This review is ascribed, by a correspondent of the Lon. Gentleman's Mag., (1814, Pt. 1, 138,) to the Rev. John Mitford; and the writer remarks, in a note, "erroneously ascribed to Sir W. Scott in Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter: whereas if Miss Mitford is correct both these gentlemen are mistaken:

"Mr. Gifford," she remarks, referring to this "deserved castigation," (so she styles it.) "afterwards made amends for the severity of his strictness on the young girl's book by giving a very favourable and kindly notice of the first series of 'Our Village." "—Introduc, to her Dramat. Works, 1854. See No. 7.

We quote a few lines on this volume (2d cd.) from another reviewer:

"Miss Mitford excels in her description of local scenery, for the attractions of which she appears to possess that genuine taste which indicates an accomplished and commonly a virtuous mind."—Lon. Uritical Rev.

"Every one now knows 'Our Village;' and every one knows that the nocks and corners, the haunts and the copses, so delightfully described in its pages, will be found in the immediate neighbourhood of Reading, and more especially around 'Three-Mile Causa,' a cluster of cottages on the Basingstoke Road, in one of which our authoress has now resided for many years."—It. "We have no passion for 'brasking a butterfly upon the wheel,' and should not notice this little volume if we were not on the whole pleused with its contents. The abschess of country scenery in which it abounds have such a convincing art of locality, the human figures interspersed among them are touched in such a larghter-loving, good-humoured spirit of caricature, innocent, and ret often pungent withal, that we scare-ly know a more agreeable perzobile of trifles for the amusement of an idle hour. Abundant cof the work. ... We have taken the frouble of making these observations, because, Miss Mittord is capable of better things; and we have no doubt that our hints will not be thrown away on her."

"Miss Mictord's eigent little volume is just in unison with the time: it is a gallery of pictures, landscapes. fresh, glowing, and sutirely English: portraits,—likenessee, we doubt not,—all simply hit sweetly coloured: in short, a book to make us forget the hurry, the bustle, the noise around, in the leaves, tell old trees, and rich meadows of her delightful Village."—Lon. "Trealism, 'Master Christopher North, there's lites Mithris, author of "Our Village," an admirable person in all respects, of whom you have never to my recollection taken any notice in the Magasine. What is the meaning of that? Is it an oversight? Or have you omitted her name intentionally from your subgets on our female wurthies?

"Norry." I am waiting for her second volume. Miss Mitford has not, in my opinion, either the pathon or the humour of Washington Irvine; but she excels him in vigorous conception of character and in the truth of her pictures of English life and manners. Her writings broathe a sound, pure, and healthy morality, and are pervaded by a genuine rural spirit,—the spirit of merry England. Every line bespeaks the lady.

"Shepherd." I admire Miss Mitford just excessively. I flinns wither the religion and settees, and about the fine folks in them.

"It is with a feeling of gratification equal to that with which we have just perused this pleasing addition to 'Our Village' annals, we are here enabled to repeat our favourable opinion of their style and character, of their simplicity, taste, and originality. With equal pretensions in other points, they indisputably boast more variety and more discrimination of character than the Stetches in the precading volume, while they aspire to a higher class. They open wider and more general views of rural life, and peculiarities of temper and disposition in the more elevated rustice around the village, in particular towards the close of its history,—even more than we were entitled to look for from the simple plan and promise given in the outset and in the whole of the former volume."—Lon. "We have now before us her fifth volume of 'Our Village;' and neatly half bound, in a book case behind our chair, are her form preceding volumes. We have read them over and over; and, when the winter evenings come, it is not at all improbable that we shall read them over again. Her Village Sketches are always new to us. We open any page, and go on with that sort of delight which we experience only when we happen to light on the Spectatur or the Rambler. We would not exchange these five volumes for all the novele put together that have been published in London during the past five years. There are many of the sketches fat this volume, which we have read not long since in the Annuale and disagned are we to meet such agreeoles acquaintances.

"In the annals of modern literature there are few collections of plays by a woman, including tragedies in verse, which have succeeded on the English stage. Here, however, is an instance. In her ripeness of age, Miss Mitford has collected into one chaplet the laurells gathered in her prime of authorship; and she has given it to the world with a gruc-ful and loving letter of reminiscence and benediction. We read these words with the tendarness of an old friendship. . . . It will be seen by our extracts that Miss Misford goesips lightly and grucefully about her early successes and failures, her friends and foes. . . Laid by the side of the volume of 'Dramatic Works of Joanna Baillie,' these volumes suffer no disparagement. This is high praise; and it is well deserved. The books which we thus venture to place together might appeal to the judgments of literary Europe, and we should have no fear of Britomart or Bloomer producing any thing which could make a competent jury uncrown either of the two kindred—yet distinct—female tragte poets of England."—Lon. Athen., 1854, 931–933.

We noticed an announcement, some time since, that it was in contemplation to publish a selection from her correspondence, from the numerous papers in the hands of her executor, the Rov. W. Harness. Should this project be carried out— and it ought to be carried out—we hope that application will be made to our friend Mr. James T. Fields, of Boston, (see p. 595 of this Dictionary,) for some of the many letters of friendship and literary memoranda addressed to him by Miss Mitford. We have quoted many critical opinions on the characteristics of this excellent writer; but there are a number before us still unnoticed.

"Her first claims on the public were no doubt as a poetess, in her early 'Sketches,' and in her 'Christina, the Maid of the South Seas,' a six-canto production of the Sir Walter Scott school, of considerable merit: but she is chiefly to be remembered as the author of 'Our Village,' so full of truth, and raciness, and fine English life; and for her three tragedies, 'Julian,' 'The Vespers of Palermo,' and 'Rienzi,' the last of which was, I believe, enimently successful in representation. Her latter verses are all able and elegant; but she is deficient in that nameless adaptation of expression to thought accomplished by some indescribable, some inexpressible collocation of the best words in their best places, apparently quite necessary for the success of poetical phrase. This power, on the contrary, Mary Howitt possesses in perfection; while she is somewhat wanting in the essential matter—the more solid materials—which Miss Mitford seems to have ever at command. The one is mightiest in facts, the other in fancy."—Moir's Sketches of the Past. Lid. of the Past Half-Century, 1851, 271–272.

Mitford, William, M.P., 1744-1827, the eldest son of John Mitford, and the brother of Lord Redesdale, (ante,) ras a native of London, and studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently in the Middle Temple. In 1761, on succeeding by the death of his father to the family estate, he forsook law for letters, and especially devoted himself to the cultivation of Greek literature, for which he had displayed an early predilection. In 1769, he be-came a captain in the South Hampshire Militia, of which Gibbon was then major; (see Gibbon. Edward, p. 661 of this Dictionary;) in 1776, he visited the Continent; on his return home became a county magistrate, and, in 1778. was appointed Vorderer of the New Forest, (on the borders of which he resided;) succeeded Gibbon as Lieutenant-Colonel of the South Hampshire Militia in 1779, was appointed colonel in 1805, and resigned in 1806; sat in the House of Commons as a member for Newport, Cornwall. 1785-90; represented Berralston, 1796-1806, and from 1812 to '18 was member for New Romney. 1. Mitford's History of Greece has already come under our notice in our comments on the histories of the same country by Dr. John Gillies and Mr. Grote, (see pp. 672, 747 of this Dictionary;) but it is too important a work to be dismissed without a more careful consideration. To imagine that the faults of style, errors of statements, and partisan-ship in politics which are alleged against Mitford are suffisup in poinces when are surged against the library as clean reasons for his entire banishment from the library as clean to imparine a great absurdity. Doubtless Mitford was to imagine a great absurdity. Doubtless Mitford was superseded as an authority by Thirlwall; and both Mitford and Thirlwall have been superseded by Grote. Supersede means, to occupy a higher seat, not to exclude from the premises. If Mr. Grote will "brook no brother near the throne," he will as little quartel with those who have no disposition to dispute his supremacy. But we hasten as the citation of critical opinions on Mr. Mitford's History:

"His great pleasure consists in graining tyrants, abusing Pintarch, spelling oddly, and writing quaintly; and—what is strange, after all—his is the best modern history of threese in any language, and he is perhaps the best of all modern historians whatesower. Itaving named his sins, it is but fair to state his virtues,—learning, labour, research, wrath, and partiality. I call the latter virtues in a writer, because they make him write in carneet. —Jone Brack.

tration of the annals of the haughty conquerors of Gresos:

"This, I think, is the merit of Mittord; and it is a great one.
His very anti-Jacobin partialities, much as they have interfered, with the fairness of his history, have yet completely avoid it from being dull. He took an intervet in the parties of dresce because he was alive to the parties of his own time. He described the popular party in Athena just as he would have described the Wilgs of England. He was unjust to Demosthenes because he would have been unjust to Mr. Fox."—Da. Abnoth.

"Laokel into Mitford's History of Greece. The Athenian Democracy imparts no sort of relish for that sort of government, and justifies Arnstotic in saying, 'H Aquesparia' & trakevrafa Tepawis

How much more than nen do the Greeks appear compared with the effeminate and pusillauimous Persians! One can hardly believe them of the same species!"—Green's Diary of a Lever of Lit, Oct.

"Mr. Mitford is the first who brought to the ardnous task of Greedan history the extensive research, accurate inquiry, and profound reflection which characterize the scholars of recent times. His great work was chiefly composed during, or shortly after, the French Revolution; and it was mainly intended to counteract the visionary ideas in regard to the blessings of Greeian democracy which had spread so far in the world from the magle of Athenian genius. . . The cause of truth has been essentially aided by his exertions; and the experiences of the workings of democracy in our own times have been such as to fivild a doubt as to the accuracy of the facts he has stated, whatever healtation may be felt as to the wisdom of the expressions in which they are sometimes conveyed. . . It may appear strange to say that there is equal truth in the monarchical history of Greece by Mitford and in the regardican by Grote; but, nevertheless, it is so. Both tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, but neither the whole truth "Six Acoust Mada Alson: History of Greece by Mitford and in the regardical momen." —Hischen, Mag., xv. 73. Jan. 1824.

"There are very few works which do more honour to the literature of the present time than Mr. Mitford's History of Greece. . . . Mr. Mitford has indeed conferred a very eminent service upon his country by writing a History of Greece in the true English spirit. . . . Assuredly he is one of the most philosophical of historians. . . His book we think one of these which no man who reads it once will be satisfied without reading over and over again; we think, on the contrary, it is formed to be one of the most stable companions of a reflective man's solitude."—Ivid., v. 443-461, July, 1819.

"Considered with respect not only to the whole series of antient events which it comprises, but also to any very prominent portion of that series, Mr. Mitford's history is the best thus has appeared since the lays of Xenophon. By calling it the best, we mean that it is the strongest in that quality which is the cardinal virtue, or rather the four cardinal virtue in one, of historic composition—trustworthmess. Such praise, it will instantly occur to the reader, is seldom bestowed where it is best due without a credit-account of creatre being opened at the same time; and, in fact, it is our purpose to conform to this general practice. The work before us, indeed, is one which hears to be commended with discrimination, and its excellences, if faithfully displayed, may sustain such a contrast of shalow as would perfectly extinguish the faithing briggtness of those novels founded or fact commonly called histories.

Upon the whole, though we think it rather unfertunate it at the story of the Grecian republies should have been told by one who has so many anti-republican partialities, we think it our duty to testify that it has been more justly told by Mr. Blitteri than by any preceding author, and that those who differ from him in his political conclusions must still acknowledge their obligations to the clearness and fulness of his narrative."—Loss Brougenay: Eds., Rev., xi. 479-517, July, 1808, (Review of vol. vi. 4a, pub. 1898.)

"Though we cannot pretend to the possession of any great share of desinceratical prejudice, we must acknowledge that both in perusing the pages of Mr. Mitford and those of M. Clavier we have been nuch fatigued by the perpetual recurrence of a definance or a landatory tone whenever a tyrant happened to appear on the ground. Both these authors, it is true, are too conscientions and too accurate materially to warp facts; but it is not less true that a strong predisposition will inevitably infect the mode of viewing an object even where the intentions are the most honest."—Lon. "Mitford appears to be the great master of political wisdom whom Mr. Mitcheil has chosen to follow; and our readers must be presty generally aware of what respect is due to the prejudices of an historian awho makes heroes of the cold-blooded Darius, the crust Xerxes, and almost of the frantic Cambyses, while he can bestow an elaborate frigidity upon his account of Marathon and roll to deepen every statu upon the patriotic virtues of Demos-Grenes. We say this without meaning in the least to detract from the praises he deserves for the great care and attention he has employed in the compliation of his history; but the student will be bitserly disappointed who expects to find it rich either in impartial views or liberal opinions."—Edin. "Indeed, whenever this historian mentions Demosthenes, he violates all the laws of candour and even of decency: he weights no authorities, he makes no allowances, he forgets the best-authenticated facts in the history of the times and the most generally-recognized principles of human nature. "We could not convey a better notion of the difference between an universal and a partial knowledge of ancient learning than by directing the attention of the reader to Niebuhr and to Mitford Mitford had studied most carefully the original authorities for Grecian history; and to this research he owes his very great superiority to the crowd of his predecessors,—repeaters of repetitions and compilers of compilations. Probably no person was ever better acquainted with Thucydides or Xenophon or Arian, so far as those writers can be interpreted out of themselves. Mr. Hallate, after citing some loyal passages from a speech of Sir Harbottle Grimston, urging the recall of Charles II., remarkė,

"Such passages as these, and the general tenor of public speeches, sermons, and pamphlets in the spring of 1666, show how little Monk can be justly said to have restored Charles II., except so far as he did not persist in preventing it so long as he might have done."—Uto supra, ii. 284, n.

As we have not hositated to express our dissent from some of Mr. Montagu's conclusions, (v. p. 89, ante,) it is only fair to quote on his behalf the approval of a much more distinguished critic than we claim to be:

much more distinguished critic than we claim to be:

"A learned and valuable work upon the Life of Lord Bacon is prepared for publication by Mr. B. Montago, in which some very important facts are proved satisfactorily by the ingenious author, and show how much the criminality of this great man is exaggerated in the common accounts of his fall. But it is clearly thewar that he was prevailed upon by the intrigues of James I. and his profligate minister to abandon his own defence and sacrifice himself to their base and crocked policy; a defence which diagraces them more than it vindicates him. One thing, however, is undeniable: that they who so loudly blame Bacon overlook the measuress of almost all the great statesmen of those courty times."

Lon. Gent. Mag., 1852, Pt. 1, 410-413; Southey's Life and Corresp., chap. vi. Mr. Montagu's memory is to be respected as that of a zealous promoter of temperance and legal reform, and a man of uncommon sugacity. The work by a Water-Drinker (No. 5, supra) was trans. into French and German, and did much good at home; and he lived to see the punishment of hanging abolished for comparatively and German, and did much good at home; and he lived to see the punishment of hanging abolished for comparatively minor offences. In this effort, it will be remembered, he was greatly aided by Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir James Mackintosh, Lord Nugent, Wilberforce, and others. Lord Brougham was wont to say that Montagu was "always many years in advance of the time."

Montagu, or Montague, Charles, Earl of Hallifax, 1601-1715, fourth son of the Hon. George Montagu, first brought himself into notice by his verses on the death of King Charles the Second in 1685; and in 1687 he extended his reputation by his partnership with Prior in the Ceuntry Mouse and the City Mouse, a burisque of Dryden's Hind and Panther. When Prior learned that King William had granted Montagu a pension of £500 her arisum until an appointment could be found for him, he exclaimed.

"My triend Charles House of Commons, he rapidly made the way not pelitical distinction: in 1691 he was made a Committed State of the Treasury, and was sworn of the Privy Councilly in 1698 he was nominated Chancellor of the Exclusive in the Ying's absence; in 1699 he became Analysis of the Except of the Treasury, and appointed one of the Investigation of the Exclusive in the Ying's absence; in 1699 he became Analysis of the Except of the Treasury, and appointed one of the Investigation of the Except of the Except falling into discredit with the House of Commons during the latter years of William and in the reign of Queen. Anne, he was by George I. advanced to the earldom of Halifax, with the Order of the Garter, and was reinstated in his post of First Commissioner of the Treasury. He was esteemed a patron of poets, and his merits were of course duly celebrated by the objects of his regard. Addison arges his wearled pen to another effort when about concluding his Account of the Greatest English Poets: "I'm tired with rhyming, and would fain give o'er; But justice still demands one labour more. The noble Montague remains unnamed,

For wit, for humour, and for judgment famed; To Dorset he directs his artful muse, To Dorset he directs his artful nuse,
In numbers such as Dorset's self might use.
How negligently gracoful he unveins
His verse, and writes in love, familiar strains!
How Nassau's godlike acts adorn his lines,
And all the hero in full glory shines!
We see his army set in just array,
And Boyne's dyed waves run purple to the see.
Nor Simois, choked with men and arms and blood,
Nor rapid Xanthus' celebrated flood,
Shall longer be the neet's highest themes For rain Asimias certoriates most, Shall longer be the poet's highest themes, Though gods and heroes fought promiscuous in their streams; But now, to Nassau's secret councils raised, He aids the hero whom before he praised."

This rather extravagant laudation, it must be remembered in justice to the poet, was written as early as 1694.

In addition to the portion of the satire just noticed, his lordship wrote a number of minor poems and some political tracts. Miscellaneous Works, Lon., 1704, 8vo; Life and Miscellaneous Works, 1715, 8vo; Poetical Works, 1716, 8vo. His poems are reprinted in vol. ix. of Johnson's and Chalmers's English Poets.

son's and Chalmers's English Poets.

"Many a blandishment was practised upon Halifax which he would never have known had he no other attractions than those of his poetry, of which a short time has withered the beauties. It would now be esteemed no known, by a contributor of the monthly bundle of verses, to be told that, in strains either familiar or solemu, he sings like Montague."—Pr. JOHNSON: Lives of the Ibets, Cunningham's ed., 1854, ii. 31–86. See also iii. 33, 30, 40.

"Considered as a poet, his lordship makes a less considerable figure than the Earl of Dorset: there is a languor in his verses which seems to indicate that he was not burn with a poetical genius."—Cübber's Lives.

We have alluded to the compliments which were pro-fusely lavished upon this noble poet. The following, by the Muse of Twickenham, is not one of them:

"Prond as Apollo on his forked hill, Sat full-blown Bufo, puff'd by every quill; Fed with soft dedication all day long, Horace and he went hand-in-hand in song."

Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, This, of course, was written after Pope's quarrel with his lordship. In the Epilogue to his Satires, and the Preface to the Iliad, he speaks in a very different manner of Halifax. Swift intimates that his lordship's patronage was of an inexpensive character:

And one poor office half his days;
While Montague, who claim'd the station
To be Mecsenas of the nation,
For poets open table kept,
But ne'r considered where they slept:
Himself as rich as fifty Jews,
Was casy, though they wanted shoes," &

"His encouraryments" and a state of the Rev. Dr. Delany and his Excellency John Love

"His encouragements," again remarks Swift, "were only good words and good dinners. I never heard him say one good thing or seem to taste what was said by another."—MS. Remarks on the (Naroclers of the Court of Queen Anne: Booti's ed. of Swift's Works, xii, 227.

We all know that neither Pope nor Swift spared any man in a fit of the spleen. Thus much, at least, can be said, to the undying honour of Halifax,—that he was the carliest and best friend, and the efficient patron, of the great Newton, and procured him his appointment in the Mint.

Montagu, Edward Wortley, M.P., 1713-1776, only son of Edward Wortley Montagu and Lady Mary his wife, (post,) was the supposed author of Reflections on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republies, 1759, 8vo, (also, 1760, '69, '78,) and pub. some papers respecting his travels, and on antiquities, in Phil. Trans., &c. The work on Ancient Republics was claimed by his tutor, the Rev. Mr. Foster, but with what justice is a matter of doubt. The eccentricities of Montagu, who spent much of his time in the East, and alternately employed himself in keeping Mohammedan fasts and breaking Christian commandments, will be found detailed at length in the following volumes: Nichols's Leicestorshire; Nichols's Lit. Anec.; L. T. Rede's Anecdotes, 1799; Lady M. W. Mon-tagu's Letters; Mrs. E. Montagu's Letters.

Montagu, Mrs. Elizabeth, 1720-1800, the daughter of Matthew Robinson, Esq., of West Layton, York-shire, was married in 1742 to Edward Montagu, Esq., of Denton Hall, grandson of the fifth Earl of Sandwich and cousin to Edward Wortley Montagu, the husband of Lady Mary. By the death of her husband in 1775, she inherited a large fortune, which enabled her to maintain that splendid hospitality by which the leaders of fashion and letters, at home and abroad, were not slow to profit. these parties we have graphic accounts by many writers of the day, and perhaps none better than that of the lively

It is to be remembered that there was a wide interval between the first appearance of Warton's first vol. in 1774 and the date of Mr. Hallam's critique, 1839. Dr. Johnson's early admiration of and late disgust for Mrs. Montagu are sarry admiration of and into dispuss of anis, anomago are as familiar to the literary student as the existence of the same opposing relations, at an earlier period, between Pope and Mrs. Montagu's cousin, Lady Mary. Johnson did not admire the "Essay on Shakespear;" but it is only fair to add that his adverse criticism was expressed before as well as after the enther's name was made public. Beswell shall the own story:

"Mrs. Montage, a lady distinguished for having written as Base's on Shakapears, being mentioned,...

"Exystage. 'I think that Reay does by henour.'

"Jonsson. Yee, gir, it does her henour; but it would do nobody, else bonour. I have, indeed, not read it all. But when I take up the end of a web and find it packthread, I do not expect by looking further to find embraddery. Sir, I will wonture to say there is not one sentonce of true criticism in her book.'

"Gamper. But it supply it shows how work Veletire has ing further to find ambreidery. Sir, I will venture to say any and not one sentence of true criticism in her book."

"Gaante." But, sir, surely it shows how much Veitaire has mistaken Shakspeare,—which nobody else has done."

"Johnson. Sir, nobedy sies has though it worth while. And what merit is there in that? You may as well praise a school-master for whipping a boy who has construed ill. No, sir; there is no real criticism in it.—none showing the beauty of thought as found of her beek, and I wonder at it; for neither I, nor Beauters, nor Mrs. Thrule [Mrs. Thrule denied this assertion] could get through it."... One day at Sir Joshua's, when it was related that Mrs. Montagu, in an excess of compliment to the author of a modern tragedy [Braganari, had exclaimed, 'I trumble for Shakspeare.' Johnson said, 'When Shakspeare has got — [Johnson for the interest and Mrs. Montagu for his defined; hets in a poor state indeed.'" See Croker's Beawell's Life of Johnson, ed. 1848, 205, 347.

On another occasion Johnson said,

"I nover did her any serious harm; nor would I.—though I could give her a bite; though she must provoke me much first."

"Mrs. Montagu," said Dr. Beartie, "was very kind to him; but site had more wit than any ludy, and Johnson could not bear that any one should be thought to have wit but himself."

"The merit of the pieces before us seems to consist mainly in the great golety and vivocity with which they are written. The wit, to-be-sure, is often childish, and generally strained and artificial; but still it both sparkles and abounds; and, though we should admire still it both sparkles and abounds; and, though we should admire it more if it were better selected, or even if there were loss of it, we cannot witness this profuse display of spirits and ingeouity without receiving a strong impression of the talents and ambitton of the writer. The funits of the letters, on the other hand, are more numerous. In the first place, they have properly speaking, no subjects. They are all letters of mere idleness, friendship, and flattery. There are no events, no reasonings, no anecdotes of persons who are still remembered, no literature, and scarcely any original or serious opinious. . . . There are not still tensible the volumes before us; and we do not exactly perceive the necessity of reading the bad letters before we are favoured with the good. "Loss Jespry: Eliz. Ken. xv. 76-87.

"But taste, of which no doubt she had before her innunterable examples, and the desire of shining continually,—natumi enough in a person who had in all probability been told often how much she was fitted to shine,—are the defects that appear in almost every page of her letters. Mrs. Montagu is evidently opprossed by the lead of her own superfority. She writes like a person that has a character to support, and whose correspondents would have a right to complain if she cossed one moment to be very wise or witty....
But, though we do not think quite so highly of her as Mrs. (Silbert') Wost had been taught to think, we are far from denying that she writes with a viacity and cloverness which account well enough for the impression she seems to have made upon her contemporaries."—Lon. Quar. Res., x. 31-41.

Madame D'Arblay gives a different verdict:

Wilberforce admired her greatly:

"Mrs. Montagu senior," he writes in his Journal in 1789, "has many fine and great and amiable qualities."

"It was not a matter of wonder." says Mrs. Thomson, "that the scholar and the statesman [she speaks generally] delighted in her conversation; for her mind was continually progressing, not only from her own efforts to improve it, but from he insensible collision with superior understandings. . . . Long, long will it be before the 'Blues' can look for such another queen; and could she, and grould she, arise, where could she look for such subjects as those who thronged, at the bidding of Mrs. Montagu, to Portman Square?"

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley, by birth Lady Mary Fierrepont, 1690?-1762, was the eldest daughter of Brelyn, Earl of Kingston, (afterwards Marquis of Dorthester, finally Duke of Kingston.) by his wife the Lady Mary Fielding, daughter of William, Earl of Denbigh.

She became noted at an early age for the extent of her knowledge, the brilliancy of her conversational powers, the knowledge, the brilliancy of her conversational powers, the knowledge, the brilliancy of her conversational powers, the gallekness of her wit, and the attractions of her person. In August, $712, against the will of her father, she was married to Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq., grandson of the first Earl of Sandwich. Four years later, Mr. Montagu was absent on his mission until October, 1718, accompanied by his wife, who as this time write those sprightly Letters which have confirmed upon her name such celebrity. Many of her subsequent Letters indeed, were also published; but, with the accompanied of these addressed to Lady Max between 1720 and '26, it is doubtful if they have added to the writers reputation. Whilst abroad, Lady Montagu became satisfied of the efficacy of inoculation for the smallpox,—are remody then universal in the Turkish dominions,—and, in 1717, made the trial on her son, (Edward Wortley Montagu, ante,) then about three years of age. In 1722, her daughter,—afterwards Countesa of Bute,—then six years old, was inoculated, and in a short time those of the children of the world family that hed not hed the sould family that hed not hed the nuccusated, and in a snort time those of the children of the royal family that had not had the smallpox were subjected to the operation with entire success. The illustrious example was, of course, soon followed; and thus, amidst the protests of the projudices of the learned and the superstition of the ignorant, a great medical reform was introduced by a woman,—though not without the assistance of Mr. Maitland, who had been attached to the embasy to Turkey in the canacity of physician. From October 1872 Turkey in the capacity of physician. From October, 1718, to July, 1739, Lady Montagu was one of the acknowledged chiefs in the English world of fashion and letters,—flattered by the beaux, courted by politicians, and alternately praised and lampooned by the bard of Twickenham, where for some time she fixed her abode. The causes of her quarrel with Pope have been investigated with sufficient care by preceding biographers. To what an extent it was carried may be seen at a glance, by comparing Pope's brutal attack on her ladyship—in his Imitation of the First Satire of the Second Book of Horace (1732)--with the equally reprehensible Reply by which the fair (not gentle) object of his ribaldry suffered her name and pen to be disgraced.

To the surprise of the fashionable world, in 1739, Lady Montagu determined to pass the rest of her days on the Continent, without requiring the attendance of her husband. From this date until about 1758, she resided chiefly at Brescia and at Louvère, on the shores of the lake of Iseo, in the Venetian territory. She then settled at Venice, where she resided until the death of Mr. Montagu, in 1761. an absence of twenty-two years, she arrived in England in October, and died in the ensuing summer.—August 21, 1762 in the seventy-third year of her age. As she corresponded with Mr. Montagu until his death, it has been argued the there was no estrangement existing between them; but this is certainly a very charitable construction.

As an author, Lady Montagu deserves notice by her brilliant Letters, already alluded to. Her Works, indeed, contain a number of poetical pieces, (Town Eclogues, &c.,) and some Essays, which, according to a late eminent critic, and some assays, which, according to a late eminent crito, would hardly have sufficed to immortalize her name:

"Her poetry, though abounding in lively conceptions, is already consigned to that oblivion in which mediocrity is destined, by an irrevocable sentence, to slumber till the end of the world. The Essays are extremely insignificant, and have no other morit, that we can discover, but that they are very few and very short."—

Lord Jeffrey, in reviewing Mr. Dalloway's edit. of Lady Mary's works, 1803, 5 vols. 8vo, after a notice of her ladyship's earlier letters, (ante.) 1715, remarks,

"The second volume, and a part of the third, are occupied with those charming letters, written during Mr. Wortley's embassy to Constantinople, [1716-18,] upon which the literary reputation of Lady Mary has hitherto been exclusively founded. It would not become us to say any thing of productions which have so long engaged the admiration of the public. The grace and vivacity, the ease and conciseness, of the narrative, and the description which they contain, still remain univalied, we think, by any epistolary compositions in our language, and are but slightly shaded by a sprinkling of obsolete ittle-tattle or womanish vanity and affectation. The authenticity of these letters, [i. c. those first pub. in 1763, 3 vols. 12mo, mate.] though at one time disputed, has not lately been called in question; but the secret history of their publication has never, we believe, been laid before the public. The editor of this collection from the original papers gives the following account of it. . . . [lead this account.] The next series of letters consists of those written to her sister the Countess of Mar from 1725 to 1727. These Letters have at least as much vivacity, wit, and sarcasm as any that have at least as much vivacity, wit, and sarcasm as any that have at least as much vivacity, wit, and sarcasm as any that have been already published, and, though they contain little but the ancedotes and scandal of the time, will long continue to be read and admired for the brilliancy and hacility of the composition. Though Lady Mary is excessively entertaining in this correspondence, we cannot say, however, that she is either very amiable or very interesting: there is rather a negation of good affection, we think, throughout, and a certain cold-hearted levity that borders sometimes upon missarthropy and sometimes on indecency. . . We have no doubt whatsoever that one of the things which drove Lady Mary from England was the ennity she caused all around her by the license of her tongue and pen. She was always writing scandal; a journal full of it was burn by her family; her very panegyrics were sometimes malicions, or were thought so, in consequence of her character, as in the instance of the extraordinary verses addressed to Mes. which was much increased by Lady Mary's personal circumstances and by the vivacity, spirit, and boldness of her pen. But, now that the extraneous sources of admiration have run dry, we con fess that the intrinsic value of the letters seems less striking, and that if we were to deduct from Lady Mary's pleasantry and wil those passages which a respectable woman ought not, perhaps, to have written, we should very considerably reduce her claims to literary eminence."—Lon. Quar. Ren., Iviii. 147-190: Review of Lord Wharneliff's ed., q. v.

We have referred to Lady Montagu's clevated rank as a leader of Cubion.

leader of fashion. She valued this position at least as much as her literary reputation, and took care to make each conducive to the interests of the other. Pope could write, doubtless with a good conscience, before their

But there was one less obtrusive worshipper at her shrine whom she preferred even to Pope.

"The brilliant Mary Montagu said that she had known all the wits, and that Addison was the best company in the world."—
Lord Macculay's Essay, Ord. and Histor. 1854, iii. 304.

"And so farewell, peor, flourishing, disappointed, reconciled, wise, foolish, enchanting Lady Mary! Fair English vision in Turkish vision in ours; the female wit of the days of Pope; beneficetress of the species: irritating satirist of the circles. Thou didst err for want of a little more heart—perhaps for want of finding enough in others, or for loss of thy mother in infancy: but thy loss was our gain: for it gained us thy books and thy inoculation. ... Lovable indeed thou wert not, whatever thou mightst have been rendered; but admirable thou wert, and ever will thou be thought so, as long as pon writeth straightforward and sense or Sultana hath a charm."—Latin Hust: Mes, Women, and Books. Women, and Books.

We certainly would not advise our young women to imitate all of Lady Mary's ways and modes of thinking, nor to copy carefully after all of her highly-seasone epistles; but there are points in which she might be followed with advantage. It must be allowed, according to a late eminent critic, that although a rate eminent critic, that attnough it allowed by the world, she seems to have possessed a masculine solidity of understanding, great liveliness of fancy, and such powers of observation and discrimination of character as to give her opinious great authority on all the ordinary subjects of practical manners and conduct, "—Loza Jeffers," Contrib. to Blin. Rev. 1853, 924.

One more hint to our female readers, and we have done:

One more hint to our feufale readers, and we have done:
"Her learning never caused Lady Mary to contenu the pursuits more especially allotted to her sex: on the contrary, we find her asying, in one of her late letters, while treating of her granddaughter's [Lady Louisa Stuart] education. 'I think it as scandalous for a woman not to know how to use a needle as for a man not to know how to use a sword.'"—[Letter to the Countess of Bute,
